Mr. McKELLAR. Before the Senator leaves that, are we to build up a Russian cheka in this country? We are getting to have a tremendous secret-service organization, or perhaps I should say organizations. I am not so sure about the value of these secret-service organizations. I think they are frequently used as a means of doing great wrong, and I have my doubts about secret-service systems in a republican form of government like ours.

I have been astounded at the tremendous growth and the use of large sums of money for the "secret service", as it is called, of the Department of Justice. I am just wondering whether the Senator is giving his approval, or will he, after this investigation, advise the Senate to give its approval, to a larger and a stronger system of secret service in our Government.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator has asked a question, and I must answer it in all frankness.

We have a bill dealing with that subject, which I do not bring to the attention of the Senate today because the subcommittee has not had an opportunity to study it. But I think I may say that we are agreed that this bureau spoken of by the Senator should be enlarged.

I know what evils have crept into the system in the past, and I want to avoid them so far as possible, but the Senator would be amazed, perhaps, to hear the responses to a questionnaire which I sent out to the 48 Governors of the States of this Union. I asked five questions. I will not give them in detail, but in effect. I asked, "Do you believe that it would be advantageous to have the Federal Government cooperate more closely with the States in the administration of criminal justice so far as those matters are concerned which might possibly have an interstate significance?" I asked a similar question looking to what I called an American Scotland Yard, using the term in an Oppenheim sense, a legendary sense, because, as a matter of fact, I say in all truth that I believe that the Division of Investigation of the Department of Justice in the Federal Government of the United States is unsurpassed in this world as an investigative body and an institution for running down criminal activities. That is my testimony, and at some other time I am going to enlarge on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was alleged in the newspapers at one time that this secret service body of the Department of Justice investigated and rifled certain Senators' offices here in the Capitol. The Senator does not approve of that, I know.

Mr. COPELAND. I certainly do not approve of it, and I have some very profound convictions about certain personnel which I will discuss in private with the Senator. But honestly administered and capably administered, this Division of Investigation can be made a more powerful agency for good in its field than any other arrangement that could be suggested. That is my opinion.

As I have said, I am speaking now for myself. I want to have an enlargement of this body and would have the Governor of each State recommend to the Attorney General two persons regarded by the Governor as suitable to be members of this Division of Investigation, nominated, just as we nominate men to enter West Point. Then these candidates of the Governors will be examined by the Department of Justice to see whether they are worthy and well qualified. If they are, they will be made members of the Division of Investigation, given the training which we give all of our men—and I want to say that it is good training—and then paid, because they are Federal officials, from funds appropriated for the Division of Investigation. They will then be assigned to the particular State from which they have come.

The response has been amazing. I expected to have protests from many States where there was a firm conviction of State rights, such as Connecticut, my neighboring State, which is one of the strongest State-rights States in the Union. Out of 48 Governors, 36 have responded, and 34 of them are in favor of the plan. Almost every Southern State approved of it.

What would these two men from the Senator's State do? Every State, no matter how rural may be its population or how wide its expanse, is entitled to give the very best it can in the way of protection against the criminal. In my native State the sheriff of the average rural county is selected not because he knows anything about police methods or the apprehension of criminals but because he is a popular man. He is made the sheriff. He is the chief peace officer. It happens many times in my State in a rural county that the citizen is given almost no protection, not because of any unwillingness on the part of the sheriff but because of his lack of knowledge of the way how to proceed in the apprehension of a criminal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, does the Senator's State have a State constabulary?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; we have.

Mr. WALSH. Do they not take care of crimes in the rural districts?

Mr. COPELAND. They do; but in many States there is no State constabulary.

In the case of the two men provided for, one man would be on duty in his own district, and one man at the Division of Investigation of the Department of Justice in Washington, or central headquarters. He would be a man who would become acquainted with the peace officers of the State, and at the same time he would be the custodian of the copies of the fingerprints. He would have at his command experts in chemistry and bacteriology who could help to solve the question of the crime.

We have on file here in Washington over 4,000,000 fingerprints, the largest collection of fingerprints ever assembled; but they are almost unavailable in time of necessity in case of a crime happening, we will say, in Nevada or in Idaho, because it is so far away that it takes a long time to get the fingerprints sent on and the report returned.

To answer more fully the question of my friend from Tennessee, I may say that I do believe that the Division of Investigation, under safeguards, could be properly enlarged. I think that is the view of those in authority in the Federal Government.

The last bill I shall present which, as I said a little while ago, is regarded by the Department of Justice as the key bill, is the bill to regulate commerce in small firearms. I wish to state now that there is no intention on the part of the committee to interfere with sportsmen or to interfere with the possession of rifles and shotguns, nor to interfere with the possession of a pistol by a qualified person, one who should properly have it.

It is shocking to learn what we are doing in the way of increasing the possession of firearms in America. Since the end of the World War we have imported from abroad over 1,000,000 pistols. Our domestic manufacturers are turning out about 500,000 pistols per year. That means that since the end of the World War we have added to our possession of pistols and revolvers seven or eight millions. The life of a revolver is almost endless under ordinary use. So, taking the firearms we had in our possession before the end of the World War period, and adding to that number those we have acquired since, I suppose it is safe to say that we have 15 or 20 million pistols in the United States.

One would not have common sense if one thought he could prevent the acquiring of a pistol by a gangster or an underworld character; but until we have better control than we have now it will continue to be too easy for the gangster to get a pistol. I know that one can go into any machine shop and between sunrise and sunset have a pistol made, or something that would serve as a gun.

Bear in mind that in the United States 71 percent of our homicides, our murders, are committed by the use of firearms. In England the number is 10 percent; in Australia 17 percent; in Japan 1 percent. In the United States the ease with which any citizen can get a pistol makes that weapon the instrument of choice in almost all the crimes committed. That ought not to be so.

The plan which we have contemplates first licensing the manufacturer. The manufacturer can sell only to a licensed retailer, who in his turn is pledged to sell only to a person who is authorized under the law of his State to purchase a pistol.

Second, the manufacturer is required to file with the Secretary of Commerce at least one bullet fired from every gun he manufactures. The rifling in the gun fingerprints or marks the bullet, so that by having on file these bullets there can often be a determination as to whether the bullet came from this gun or from that gun.

Third, the manufacturer must have a serial number supplied by the Secretary of Commerce, the governmental number.

In the next place, the ammunition maker must be licensed and can sell only to a licensed retailer. The licensed retailer cannot sell ammunition except for a gun which the owner has a legal right to possess. If he owns a .38 Smith & Wesson, he cannot buy .44 cartridges. He must buy .38 cartridges. Furthermore, the bullet in casting must have marked on the bottom a letter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, why not have the purchaser exhibit a card at the time he buys the ammunition?

Mr. COPELAND. That is also a good suggestion. The man who buys the ammunition will have a card which is issued by the State constabulary, with his photograph and his fingerprints on it, so there will not be any question about him. The caliber of the gun will also appear on the card. It will be well, however, to do as the Senator suggests.

The plan of marking the base of the bullet with a letter means that the country will be divided into sections. For instance, New England and New York might be in A section; Michigan and Ohio might be in B section; St. Louis might be in C section; San Francisco in D section. The seller of the ammunition must sell his A ammunition, for example, only in the A territory. If a man is found murdered in Arkansas, and a bullet is taken from the body of the murdered person, and on the base the letter A is found, the police officials know at once that that bullet came from New York or New England, and it will be a tremendous aid in running down the criminal.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It might be said that this fingerprints the ammunition, precisely as now we fingerprint the criminal.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator from Michigan is right.

Mr. President, I ask that the last bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

We have presented today 13 bills.

Mr. WALSH. Is the Senator's committee still engaged in investigating this subject?

Mr. COPELAND. The committee is engaged in investigating it, and the committee is going to ask to be continued.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to urge upon the Senator, for I think it is highly important, that a systematic study be made of the manner in which violent crime cases have been disposed of and an analysis made of the facts. I think such a study will show a surprising record of extreme leniency, and that a great deal of our trouble with this problem is due to the fact that the courts have not dealt strictly and harshly with those guilty of committing crimes of violence.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator from Massachusetts will do us the honor to read the committee's record—and it is going to be so indexed that every matter such as this can be readily reached—he will find the testimony of judges and of leading citizens along the line suggested by the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. As yet, however, the subcommittee has not reached any conclusion on that question?

Mr. COPELAND. We have not yet reached any conclusion.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from New York will agree with me that it would be well to find out how universal is the feeling on the part of the people in our country. I read in the press of our State and in the press of other States that there is a growing feeling that the courts are responsible for allowing some things, political or legal, to bring about a lenient disposition of these cases.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator is right. I may say to the Senate that the select committee was given an appropriation of $10,000, and we still have $3,000 left. We have, I think, done this work as economically as similar work has ever been done by any committee; but, at the proper time, we shall ask that the committee be continued, so that it may operate through the coming recess, and report to the next session of Congress, because we have the feeling—and that is the feeling of the President and of the Attorney General and all those in authority—that this is a problem which should be gone into to the very bottom. I am sure the Senate will, at the proper time, give us the appropriation which we may ask for when we determine as to what it shall be.

Mr. President, these bills are presented. I assume they will be numbered and referred to the appropriate committees. In due time our committee will ask the Judiciary Committee to have hearings, perhaps grouping the various proposals we now present, and we shall present more a little later.

It is our purpose to bring before the Judiciary Committee at the proper time distinguished persons who have studied deeply the subject; and then, of course, it is our fond hope and expectation that these bills will be enacted into law. My feeling is—and I am sure that it is the feeling of the committee and of all of its members individually—that we have already presented, Mr. President, measures which, if enacted into law, will go far toward the control of crime in this country. If we can get these bills enacted into law, and then have them enforced, we believe that there will be such a tightening up of the forces operating against criminal activity as will be well worth while. So I urge upon Senators that, at the appropriate time, they study these bills and give the committee the benefit of any suggestions they desire to make.

Further, I ask the Senate to accept my apology for taking so much time. I had no idea this would be so long a speech; but I am going away tonight, I may say, to my leader, for a few days; and so I shall not again tire the Senate for some time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The several bills introduced by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY] will be received, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the appropriate committees.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] and the other members of the select committee are to be commended for the diligence shown in the study that is being made. It relates to a very difficult and important subject. If public sentiment shall be sufficiently aroused, we will witness the termination of gang rule where it exists in the United States.

AMBASSADOR TO SOVIET UNION—WILLIAM C. BULLITT

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William Christian Bullitt, of Pennsylvania, to be ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, is it the desire to take up this nomination this afternoon, may I inquire?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is; unless the Senator has serious objection to its being taken up this afternoon.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to state that I am entirely willing to proceed, but it will take 10 or 15 minutes of the Senate's time to discuss it.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think, under the circumstances, we had better proceed with the nomination.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I shall deal now with the pending nomination of the new United States Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations yesterday took two actions, only one of which has been reported in the public press. The unreported action, in my view, was the more important and the more significant. On the one hand, the committee voted, with two dissenting votes, one of which was mine, for reasons hereafter stated, to report to the Senate the nomination of William Christian Bullitt to fill this new ambassadorship. It occurs to me, I might say parenthetically, that it is somewhat ironical to send a "Christian" to Russia in this capacity. The other action taken by the committee was the unanimous adoption of a resolution which I submitted requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to submit to the committee and the Senate all the papers involved in the agreement which was reached between the President and the representative of the Russian Soviet Union upon which the recognition of the Soviet Government is based and the appointment of this ambassador is predicated. My motion sought the full official information respecting the arrangement which has been entered into governing the contacts and the warrants which are to exist between these two countries.

The only information heretofore available to the Congress upon this subject, the only information available to the Committee on Foreign Relations, has been the casual information carried in the newspapers. It did not seem to me appropriate that in a matter of this long standing and often bitter controversy, and in a matter of this major importance in the opinion of many of the American people, that the Senate and the Foreign Relations Committee should be guided solely by what they had seen in the public prints. Indeed, it would have been most unfortunate if we had rested upon that basis of information because, if that basis of information is to be relied upon, I am wondering what we would say in respect to the publications that have appeared indicating that Moscow has already suggested a repudiation of the warranties that are contained in the agreement between the two countries. I hasten to add that apparently there is no foundation for this gossip of repudiation. I am simply making the point, at the outset, that we had no business to rely in a situation of this character upon unofficial information obtained solely from the newspapers. I say, with great respect, that it would have been highly appropriate for the President of the United States to have addressed a message to the Senate formally notifying us of his action with respect to the recognition of Russia and submitting to us officially the agreements upon which that recognition is based. The Senate has partnership responsibility with the Executive for our foreign relations, and complete mutual information is at all times desirable. There are some things that cannot be rubber-stamped, no matter what our faith.

Mr. President, these two questions, that of the recognition of the Soviet Government, and that of the confirmation of the ambassador to the Soviet Union, in my view, are philosophically related. I freely consent that a powerful argument can be made, and with entire propriety, that the Congress has no actual jurisdiction whatsoever over the actual act of recognition. I concede that it is exclusively an Executive function and prerogative to recognize foreign governments. But I am unable to escape the conviction, since the recognition of this particular government has been a subject of such long-standing controversy and has been a subject of so many critical State papers under three or four administrations, that there is at last an indirect relationship between these two propositions—the proposition upon the one hand of recognition, which is exclusively an Executive function, the proposition upon the other hand of the confirmation of an ambassador to Russia, which is exclusively a senatorial function. Underneath both there is a common problem and a common responsibility.

Therefore, because of this belief and because of the belief that the entire official record should be a part of the official record of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Senate before any action be taken in respect to confirmation, I offered the resolution in the committee to which I have adverted. The resolution was adopted. I voted in committee against the confirmation of Mr. William Christian Bullitt, with the statement at the time that I did it pending the arrival of these papers. I voted in protest against any blind action by the Senate in advance of full official information respecting this epochal decision which has reversed the decisions of four previous occupants of the White House.

Mr. President, the State Department very promptly and courteously responded unofficially to the spirit of the resolution by immediately sending to the distinguished chairman of the committee the official printed copies of all of the exchanges between President Roosevelt and Mr. Maxim Litvinoff, the People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. I now have this compilation in my hand. It is an official publication identified as Eastern European Series No. 1 of the Department of of State. I understand that the formal report will be subsequently forthcoming. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I am willing now to proceed upon the theory that we do have the information in reliable and authentic form upon which intelligently to proceed. It is for the purpose of emphasizing the nature of these contacts and these warranties and these solemn agreements that I rise to speak at the moment in respect to the confirmation. In many aspects, the rights and the institutions of American citizens hang upon the integrity of these undertakings. It is my purpose to say that time and events will vindicate the action of the President only in the degree that these engagements do not degenerate into diplomatic "scraps of paper."

Mr. President, we have no right to question the kind of government which exists under any other flag so long as it is a stable government in the accepted sense of that word. Much as I have opposed the recognition of Russia, and I think primarily upon the ground that I believe that no country which outlaws God can rise to an acceptable place in the parliament of nations because any such nation seems destined for spiritual bankruptcy, regardless of what I may have felt respecting the recognition of Russia, my attitude certainly has not been based upon any theory that we have any right to dictate to another people or that we have any right to pass censorship upon the type of government which they elect to choose for themselves. That is none of our legitimate business.

But, Mr. President, that vital rule works both ways. That rule is utterly reciprocal. The reason fundamentally why I have opposed the recognition of Russia is that we, too, have a right to elect our own form of government without any outside interference, and so long as the Russian Government was engaged in subvertive propaganda officially or semiofficially, directed from Moscow in any degree—propaganda aimed at the destruction of our form of government within our own United States—that we had no justification whatsoever in governmental philosophy or ethics or international fair play to accept, on the basis of common partnership and parity in the family of nations, an institution of that obnoxious character.

Therefore the fundamental question, so far as the recognition of Russia is concerned, which has challenged my concern, is this particular question whether or not we have received adequate, dependable, reliable, and enforcible assurances that this sort of imported treason is to cease. Now, let us refer to the official records and see to what extent this result has been accomplished, at least in the letter of the bond.

Mr. President, I want to read the first of the letters addressed to the President of the United States by Mr. Litvinoff. May I say before I read it that I think it is highly important that it should be read, so that no one beyond the seas may have any misconception of the fact that these guaranties are fundamental and primary and continuous so far as our relationships with the Russian Soviet Government are concerned. They are not idle diplomatic gestures. They are hard realities. Because I think it should be a part of our official record before the vote is taken, I read the first of these commitments. It is a letter addressed to the President of the United States by Mr. Litvinoff:

> MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to inform you that coincident with the establishment of diplomatic relations between our two Governments it will be the fixed policy of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—
> 1. To respect scrupulously the indisputable right of the United States to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way and to refrain from interfering in any manner in the internal affairs of the United States, its Territories, or possessions.

Mr. President, the maintenance of the unqualified integrity of that assurance may make it possible for friendly relations to exist between these two peoples. But if any such promise be made with the tongue in the cheek as these people sometimes have made promises to others, if any such promise be made with any such reservation as sometimes attached to similar promises heretofore, namely, that it is to be honored in its treacherous breach, then there is no chance whatever for a permanently friendly relationship. I think it is worth saying emphatically and in plain language and as an axiom that the continuity of this pledge is just as important as the giving of it in the first instance. Our newly acknowledged friends cannot complain of these frank observations. I am saying even less than previous Presidents and previous Secretaries of State have said when dealing with this same subject.

I continue with the reading of the pledge of the Soviet Government:

> 2. To refrain, and to restrain all persons in Government service, and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories, or possessions, and, in particular, from any act tending to incite or encourage armed intervention or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim the violation of the territorial integrity of the United States, its Territories, or possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories, or possessions.

That is an all-inclusive statement. If that statement lives in practice as well as in precept, the future is far less jeopardized than I have feared it would be in these relationships. But, again, the good faith of the pledge is the test of its value; and I think it is worth emphasizing upon this floor, as we proceed to confirm the first ambassador to the Soviets in more than a decade, that this pledge must be continuous, and must be honored actively and not passively, or the relationship cannot sustain itself. Of course, we must proceed on the theory that good faith will be observed until or unless there shall be subsequent demonstration to the contrary.

But I have not finished. The pledge is even more complete. I quote:

> Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—

And this is particularly important because of the fact that the Russian propaganda activities which heretofore have been aimed at the heart of America have ordinarily been administered through a collateral Moscow agency.

Continuing the reading:

> Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which makes claim to be the Government of, or makes attempt upon the territorial integrity of, the United States, its Territories or possessions; not to form, subsidize, support, or permit on its territory military organizations or groups having the aim of armed struggle against the United States, its Territories or possessions, and to prevent any recruiting on behalf of such organizations and groups.

Again the warranty on the face of the contract is all-inclusive.

But even this is not all. I continue the reading:

> Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories, or possessions.

Mr. President, it seems to me that if any contract is to be written between Russia and the United States this is about as complete a contract as could be devised to cover the situation which has so disturbed the viewpoint of the United States in respect to Russian propaganda during the past decade.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. SCHALL. Is this man Bullitt, who has been named as Ambassador to Russia, the same Bullitt who, at the outset of this Administration, was maneuvering around in Europe, and claimed that he represented the President of the United States?

I remember that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] called attention to the matter at the time; and I also remember the leader of the minority, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], stating, as I remember, that the President denied that he had anything to do with Bullitt. He denied him thrice before the cock could crow again.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I think this is the same Mr. Bullitt; and I anticipate that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] will again speak for himself on that subject. At the moment I wish to pursue what I deem to be a far more important phase of this matter; namely, the foundation which has been laid beneath the act of appointment which brings this confirmation to the Senate. A stream can rise no higher than its source, and the important thing at the moment is less the personality of Mr. Bullitt than it is the basis of contractual relationship upon which recognition has been granted, out of which the appointment of the Ambassador comes.

I have read the first of these letters, Mr. President. The letter which I have read is signed by Mr. Maxim Litvinoff, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, Union of Soviet Socialistic Republics.

In the committee on yesterday the question was raised whether Mr. Litvinoff had the authority to bind his Government. So far as the committee could determine, the answer to that question is in the affirmative. There appears to be no requirement that Mr. Litvinoff's warranty must return to Moscow for any review or approval. Therefore, I assume that we are entitled to accept this official publication from the State Department as a literal and conclusive fact in respect to the protections which we seek against this subvertive propaganda. I assume it is a closed book.

I want to make it perfectly plain that I am not in the slightest degree fearful of any raid by communism on America. I think Mr. Stalin himself has recently said that communism is not an exportable product. I doubt whether it ever could be successfully exported to the United States. But fear does not need to precede vigilance. I have been raised in the theory that vigilance is the price of liberty. Therefore, it has seemed to me that complete and effective and conclusive defense against the infiltration of America by subversive propaganda was a prerequisite to any relationships of an official nature with Moscow.

It is said truthfully that European governments have received warranties of a somewhat similar nature, assuming to protect them in the past against subvertive Russian propaganda, and that these promises have been broken; but perhaps it is fair to discriminate between the two situations. Apparently, the agreements that were made by some European capitals with Moscow were not made in definite terms. Apparently, the contracts which heretofore have been broken have been broken through a misunderstanding, or at least that plea may be made in defense or in mitigation of those who broke them.

Perhaps it was that particular situation which moved the President of the United States to be scrupulously detailed when he wrote the agreement under which we are to be protected against similar jeopardy and similar outrage. At any rate, I cannot conceive how it would be possible to put into words a more complete protection against the thing which I have believed fundamentally we must be protected against before any official relationships could be appropriately renewed.

May I say, in order to make the record as conclusive as possible, that the letter from Mr. Litvinoff, which I have just read, was acknowledged by President Roosevelt from the White House, under date of November 16, repeating verbatim the pledges and the promises which were made; so that there can be hereafter no equivocation whatsoever, no pleadings of misunderstanding in any circumstance, if these pledges are not kept. I think it is utterly essential, when we proceed for the first time in the Senate of the United States to consider the relationship between these two countries, that it should be said bluntly and without equivocation that the continuity of these pledges in good faith is the price of the continuity of these relationships. We shall not sleep on our rights. Nor have we taken an anesthetic. I commend the Russian commissar for going to the last possible extreme in writing these assurances. I shall commend his Government still more for implementing them with continuous integrity. Here indeed is a situation where the proof of the pudding will be in the eating thereof.

There were other questions involved, Mr. President, between these two Governments, which apparently it was deemed advisable to liquidate in detail. Nothing, for example, could be more important that the sacred guaranty of religious freedom for our nationals in Russia, and the acknowledgment of their civil rights. I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the supplemental exchanges of letters between Mr. Litvinoff and President Roosevelt, other than to say that they cover a number of other controverted problems and in much the same detail and with much the same successful effect so far as the letter of the contracts is concerned. I do feel, however, that the record should be absolutely complete against a day of possible judgment. Therefore I ask, in connection with these observations, that the whole of this official correspondence shall be printed in the RECORD. It is by far the most important part of these proceedings. I shall then follow this exhibit with my final conclusions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ESTABLISHMENT OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH THE UNION OF SOVIET SOCIALIST REPUBLICS

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND PRESIDENT KALININ [1]

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, October 10, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Since the beginning of my administration, I have contemplated the desirability of an effort to end the present abnormal relations between the 125,000,000 people of the United States and the 165,000,000 people of Russia.

It is most regrettable that these great peoples, between whom a happy tradition of friendship existed for more than a century to their mutual advantage, should now be without a practical method of communicating directly with each other.

The difficulties that have created this anomalous situation are serious but not, in my opinion, insoluble; and difficulties between great nations can be removed only by frank, friendly conversations. If you are of similar mind, I should be glad to receive any representatives you may designate to explore with me personally all questions outstanding between our countries.

Participation in such a discussion would, of course, not commit either Nation to any future course of action, but would indicate a sincere desire to reach a satisfactory solution of the problems involved. It is my hope that such conversations might result in good to the people of both our countries.

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

MR. MIKHAIL KALININ,
President of the All Union Central Executive Committee, Moscow.

MOSCOW, October 17, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have received your message of October 10.

I have always considered most abnormal and regretable a situation wherein, during the past 16 years, two great Republics—the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics—have lacked the usual methods of communication and have been deprived of the benefits which such communication could give. I am glad to note that you also reached the same conclusion.

There is no doubt that difficulties, present or arising, between two countries, can be solved only when direct relations exist between them; and that, on the other hand, they have no chance for solution in the absence of such relations. I shall take the liberty further to express the opinion that the abnormal situation, to which you correctly refer in your message, has an unfavorable effect not only on the interests of the two states concerned, but also on the general international situation, increasing the element of disquiet, complicating the process of consolidating world peace and encouraging forces tending to disturb that peace.

In accordance with the above, I gladly accept your proposal to send to the United States a representative of the Soviet Government to discuss with you the questions of interest to our countries. The Soviet Government will be represented by Mr. M. M. Litvinoff, People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs, who will come to Washington at a time to be mutually agreed upon.

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

MIKHAIL KALININ.

MR. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
Washington.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
The White House.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. LITVINOV: I am glad to have received the assurance expressed in your note to me of this date that it will be the fixed policy of the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics:

1. To respect scrupulously the indisputable right of the United States to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way and to refrain from interfering in any manner in the internal affairs of the United States, its Territories or possessions.

2. To refrain, and to restrain all persons in Government service and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquillity, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions, and, in particular, from any act tending to incite or encourage armed intervention, or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim, the violation of the Territorial integrity of the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions.

3. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which makes claim to be the Government of, or makes attempt upon the Territorial integrity of, the United States, its Territories or possessions; not to form, subsidize, support, or permit on its territory military organizations or groups having the aim of armed struggle against the United States, its Territories or possessions, and to prevent any recruiting on behalf of such organizations and groups.

4. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in, the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions.

It will be the fixed policy of the Executive of the United States within the limits of the powers conferred by the Constitution and the laws of the United States to adhere reciprocally to the engagements above expressed.

I am, my dear Mr. Litvinoff,
Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MAXIM M. LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. LITVINOFF: As I have told you in our recent conversations, it is my expectation that after the establishment of normal relations between our two countries many Americans will wish to reside temporarily or permanently within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and I am deeply concerned that they should enjoy in all respects the same freedom of conscience and religious liberty which they enjoy at home.

As you well know, the Government of the United States, since the foundation of the Republic, has always striven to protect its nationals, at home and abroad, in the free exercise of liberty of conscience and religious worship, and from all disability or persecution on account of their religious faith or worship. And I need scarcely point out that the rights enumerated below are those enjoyed in the United States by all citizens and foreign nationals and by American nationals in all the major countries of the world.

The Government of the United States, therefore, will expect that nationals of the United States of America within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be allowed to conduct without annoyance or molestation of any kind religious services and rites of a ceremonial nature, including baptismal, confirmation, communion, marriage, and burial rites, in the English language, or in any other language which is customarily used in the practice of the religious faith to which they belong, in churches, houses, or other buildings appropriate for such service, which they will be given the right and opportunity to lease, erect, or maintain in convenient situations.

We will expect that nationals of the United States will have the right to collect from their coreligionists and to receive from abroad voluntary offerings for religious purposes; that they will be entitled without restriction to impart religious instruction to their children, either singly or in groups, or to have such instruction imparted by persons whom they may employ for such purposes; that they will be given and protected in the right to bury their dead according to their religious customs in suitable and convenient places established for that purpose, and given the right and opportunity to lease, lay out, occupy, and maintain such burial grounds subject to reasonable sanitary laws and regulations.

We will expect that religious groups or congregations composed of nationals of the United States of America in the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will be given the right to have their spiritual needs ministered to by clergymen, priests, rabbis, or other ecclesiastical functionaries who are nationals of the United States of America, and that such clergymen, priests, rabbis, or other ecclesiastical functionaries will be protected from all disability or persecution and will not be denied entry into the territory of the Soviet Union because of their ecclesiastical status.

I am, my dear Mr. Litvinoff,
Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MAXIM M. LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In reply to your letter of November 16, 1933, I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as a fixed policy accords the nationals of the United States within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics the following rights referred to by you:

1. The right to "free exercise of liberty of conscience and religious worship" and protection "from all disability or persecution on account of their religious faith or worship."

This right is supported by the following laws and regulations existing in the various Republics of the Union:

"Every person may profess any religion or none. All restrictions of rights connected with the profession of any belief whatsoever, or with the nonprofession of any belief, are annulled (decree of Jan. 23, 1918, art. 3).

"Within the confines of the Soviet Union it is prohibited to issue any local laws or regulations restricting or limiting freedom of conscience, or establishing privileges or preferential rights of any kind based upon the religious profession of any person." (decree of Jan. 23, 1918, art. 2).

2. The right to "conduct without annoyance or molestation of any kind religious services and rites of a ceremonial nature."

This right is supported by the following laws:

"A free performance of religious rites is guaranteed as long as it does not interfere with public order and is not accompanied by interference with the rights of citizens of the Soviet Union. Local authorities possess the right in such cases to adopt all necessary measures to preserve public order and safety. (Decree of Jan. 23, 1918, art. 5.)

"Interference with the performance of religious rites, insofar as they do not endanger public order and are not accompanied by infringements on the rights of others is punishable by compulsory labor for a period up to 6 months. (Criminal Code, art. 127.)"

3. "The right and opportunity to lease, erect, or maintain in convenient situations" churches, houses, or other buildings appropriate for religious purposes.

This right is supported by the following laws and regulations:

"Believers belonging to a religious society with the object of making provision for their requirements in the matter of religion may lease under contract, free of charge, from the subdistrict or district executive committee or from the town soviet, special buildings for the purpose of worship and objects intended exclusively for the purposes of their cult. (Decree of Apr. 8, 1929, art. 10.)

"Furthermore, believers who have formed a religious society or a group of believers may use for religious meetings other buildings which have been placed at their disposal on lease by private persons or by local soviets and executive committees. All rules established for houses of worship are applicable to these buildings. Contracts for the use of such buildings shall be concluded by individual believers who will be held responsible for their execution. In addition, these buildings must comply with the sanitary and technical building regulations. (Decree of Apr. 8, 1929, art. 10.)

"The place of worship and religious property shall be handed over for the use of believers forming a religious society under a contract concluded in the name of the competent district executive committee or town soviet by the competent administrative department or branch, or directly by the subdistrict executive committee. (Decree of Apr. 8, 1929, art. 15.)

"The construction of new places of worship may take place at the desire of religious societies provided that the usual technical building regulations and the special regulations laid down by the People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs are observed. (Decree of Apr. 8, 1929, art. 45.)"

4. "The right to collect from their coreligionists * * * voluntary offerings for religious purposes."

This right is supported by the following law:

"Members of groups of believers and religious societies may raise subscriptions among themselves and collect voluntary offerings, both in the place of worship itself and outside it, but only amongst the members of the religious association concerned and only for purposes connected with the upkeep of the place of worship and the religious property, for the engagement of ministers of religion and for the expenses of their executive body. Any form of forced contribution in aid of religious associations is punishable under the Criminal Code" (decree of Apr. 8, 1929, art. 54).

5. Right to "impart religious instruction to their children either singly or in groups or to have such instruction imparted by persons whom they may employ for such purpose."

This right is supported by the following law:

"The school is separated from the church. Instruction in religious doctrines is not permitted in any governmental and common schools, nor in private teaching institutions where general subjects are taught. Persons may give or receive religious instruction in a private manner" (decree of Jan. 23, 1918, art. 9).

Furthermore, the Soviet Government is prepared to include in a consular convention to be negotiated immediately following the establishment of relations between our two countries provisions in which nationals of the United States shall be granted rights with reference to freedom of conscience and the free exercise of religion which shall not be less favorable than those enjoyed in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by nationals of the nation most favored in this respect. In this connection, I have the honor to call to your attention article 9 of the treaty between Germany and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, signed at Moscow October 12, 1925, which reads as follows:

"Nationals of each of the contracting parties * * * shall be entitled to hold religious services in churches, houses, or other buildings, rented, according to the laws of the country, in their national language or in any other language which is customary in their religion. They shall be entitled to bury their dead in accordance with their religious practice in burial grounds established and maintained by them with the approval of the competent authorities, so long as they comply with the police regulations of the other party in respect of buildings and public health."

Furthermore, I desire to state that the rights specified in the above paragraphs will be granted to American nationals immediately upon the establishment of relations between our two countries.

Finally, I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, while reserving to itself the right of refusing visas to Americans desiring to enter the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on personal grounds, does not intend to base such refusals on the fact of such persons having an ecclesiastical status.

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

MAXIM LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
The White House.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Following our conversations I have the honor to inform you that the Soviet Government is prepared to include in a consular convention to be negotiated immediately following the establishment of relations between our two countries provisions in which nationals of the United States shall be granted rights with reference to legal protection which shall not be less favorable than those enjoyed in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by nationals of the nation most favored in this respect. Furthermore, I desire to state that such rights will be granted to American nationals immediately upon the establishment of relations between our two countries.

In this connection I have the honor to call to your attention article 11 and the protocol to article 11, of the Agreement Concerning Conditions of Residence and Business and Legal Protection in General concluded between Germany and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on October 12, 1925.

"ARTICLE 11

"Each of the contracting parties undertakes to adopt the necessary measures to inform the consul of the other party as soon as possible whenever a national of the country which he represents is arrested in his district.

"The same procedure shall apply if a prisoner is transferred from one place of detention to another.

"FINAL PROTOCOL

(Ad article 11)

"1. The consul shall be notified either by a communication from the person arrested or by the authorities themselves direct. Such communications shall be made within a period not exceeding seven times 24 hours, and in large towns, including capitals of districts, within a period not exceeding three times 24 hours.

"2. In places of detention of all kinds requests made by consular representatives to visit nationals of their country under arrest, or to have them visited by their representatives, shall be granted without delay. The consular representative shall not be entitled to require officials of the courts or prisons to withdraw during his interview with the person under arrest."

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

MAXIM LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
The White House.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. LITVINOFF: I thank you for your letter of November 16, 1933, informing me that the Soviet Government is prepared to grant to nationals of the United States rights with reference to legal protection not less favorable than those enjoyed in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by nationals of the nation most favored in this respect. I have noted the provisions of the treaty and protocol concluded between Germany and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on October 12, 1925.

I am glad that nationals of the United States will enjoy the protection afforded by these instruments immediately upon the establishment of relations between our countries and I am fully prepared to negotiate a consular convention covering these subjects as soon as practicable. Let me add that American diplomatic and consular officers in the Soviet Union will be zealous in guarding the rights of American nationals, particularly the right to a fair, public, and speedy trial and the right to be represented by counsel of their choice. We shall expect that the nearest American diplomatic or consular officer shall be notified immediately of any arrest or detention of an American national, and that he shall promptly be afforded the opportunity to communicate and converse with such national.

I am, My dear Mr. Litvinoff,
Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MAXIM M. LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

In reply to a question of the President in regard to prosecutions for economic espionage, Mr. Litvinoff gave the following explanation:

"The widespread opinion that the dissemination of economic information from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is allowed only insofar as this information has been published in newspapers or magazines, is erroneous. The right to obtain economic information is limited in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, as in other countries, only in the case of business and production secrets and in the case of the employment of forbidden methods (bribery, theft, fraud, etc.) to obtain such information. The category of business and production secrets naturally includes the official economic plans, insofar as they have not been made public, but not individual reports concerning the production conditions and the general conditions of individual enterprises.

"The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics has also no reason to complicate or hinder the critical examination of its economic organization. It naturally follows from this that everyone has the right to talk about economic matters or to receive information about such matters in the Union, insofar as the information for which he has asked or which has been imparted to him is not such as may not, on the basis of special regulations issued by responsible officials or by the appropriate state enterprises, be made known to outsiders. (This principle applies primarily to information concerning economic trends and tendencies.)"

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Following our conversations I have the honor to inform you that the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees that, preparatory to a final settlement of the claims and counterclaims between the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America and the claims of their nationals, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will not take any steps to enforce any decisions of courts or initiate any new litigations for the amounts admitted to be due or that may be found to be due it, as the successor of prior Governments of Russia, or otherwise, from American nationals, including corporations, companies, partnerships, or associations, and also the claim against the United States of the Russian Volunteer Fleet, now in litigation in the United States Court of Claims, and will not object to such amounts being assigned and does hereby release and assign all such amounts to the Government of the United States, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to be duly notified in each case of any amount realized by the Government of the United States from such release and assignment.

The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics further agrees, preparatory to the settlement referred to above, not to make any claim with respect to:

(a) Judgments rendered or that may be rendered by American courts insofar as they relate to property, or rights, or interests therein, in which the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics or its nationals may have had or may claim to have an interest; or

(b) Acts done or settlements made by or with the Government of the United States, or public officials in the United States, or its nationals, relating to property, credits, or obligations of any Government of Russia or nationals thereof.

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

MAXIM LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
The White House.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. LITVINOFF: I am happy to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of November 16, 1933, in which you state that:

"The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees that, preparatory to a final settlement of the claims and counter claims between the Governments of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States of America and the claims of their nationals, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics will not take any steps to enforce any decisions of courts or initiate any new litigations for the amounts admitted to be due or that may be found to be due it, as the successor of prior Governments of Russia, or otherwise, from American nationals, including corporations, companies, partnerships, or associations, and also the claim against the United States of the Russian Volunteer Fleet, now in litigation in the United States Court of Claims, and will not object to such amounts being assigned and does hereby release and assign all such amounts to the Government of the United States, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to be duly notified in each case of any amount realized by the Government of the United States from such release and assignment.

"The Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics further agrees, preparatory to the settlement referred to above, not to make any claim with respect to:

"(b) Acts done or settlements made by or with the Government of the United States, or public officials in the United States, or its nationals, relating to property, credits, or obligations of any Government of Russia or nationals thereof."

I am glad to have these undertakings by your Government and I shall be pleased to notfy your Government in each case of any amount realized by the Government of the United States from the release and assignment to it of the amounts admitted to be due, or that may be found to be due, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and of the amount that may be found to be due on the claim of the Russian Volunteer Fleet.

I am, my dear Mr. Litvinov,
Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Mr. MAXIM M. LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

WASHINGTON, November 16, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to inform you that, following our conversations and following my examination of certain documents of the years 1918 to 1921 relating to the attitude of the American Government toward the expedition into Siberia, the operations there of foreign military forces and the inviolability of the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics agrees that it will waive any and all claims of whatsoever character arising out of activities of military forces of the United States in Siberia, or assistance to military forces in Siberia subsequent to January 1, 1918, and that such claims shall be regarded as finally settled and disposed of by this agreement.

I am, my dear Mr. President,
Very sincerely yours,

MAXIM LITVINOFF,
People's Commissar for Foreign Affairs,
Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Mr. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States of America,
The White House.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1933.

JOINT STATEMENT BY THE PRESIDENT AND MR. LITVINOFF

In addition to the agreements which we have signed today, there has taken place an exchange of views with regard to methods of settling all outstanding questions of indebtedness and claims that permits us to hope for a speedy and satisfactory solution of these questions which both our Governments desire to have out of the way as soon as possible.

Mr. Litvinoff will remain in Washington for several days for further discussions.

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN ACTING SECRETARY PHILLIPS AND THE RUSSIAN FINANCIAL ATTACHÉ IN THE UNITED STATES; TELEGRAMS ADDRESSED BY ACTING SECRETARY PHILLIPS TO RUSSIAN CONSULAR OFFICER IN THE UNITED STATES [7]

NEW YORK, October 21, 1933.

DEAR MR. KELLEY: The correspondence between the President of the United States and Mr. Kalinin, President of the All Union Central Executive Committee, leads me to believe that conditions may arise in the near future, where no further useful purpose can be served by my continuing to exercise the duties with which I was vested under the exchange of notes between the Russian Ambassador and the Secretary of State of April 28 and 29, 1922.[8]

In consequence of this belief, may I not request that my present status be discontinued at the earliest convenience of the Department of State. As to certain matters of a continuing character requiring further attention, I would respectfully suggest that after the date of the discontinuance of my status they be considered as being temporarily taken under the care of the United States Government.

In terminating my official activities, I deem it a paramount duty to express my deep appreciation for the unfailing consideration with which I have been treated at the Department of State. Permit me also to say that if a moral satisfaction has been derived by me during the trying years of my service, it has been due mainly to the cognizance that I have enjoyed the confidence of the Government of the United States.

Very sincerely yours,

S. UGHET,
Russian Financial Attaché.

Hon. ROBERT F. KELLEY,
Chief, Division of Eastern European Affairs,
Department of State,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

MY DEAR MR. UGHET: I desire to refer to your letter of October 21, 1933, in which you expressed the belief that conditions would arise in the near future when no further useful purpose would be served by your continuing to exercise the duties with which you were charged under the exchange of notes between the Russian Ambassador and the Secretary of State of April 28–29, 1922, and requested that your present status be discontinued at the earliest convenience of the Department of State.

In view of the recognition of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics by the Government of the United States, I have to inform you that upon this date the Government of the United States ceases to recognize you as Russian Financial Attaché.

The Department is deeply appreciative of the able manner in which you have discharged the duties which devolved upon you under the exchange of notes referred to above and of the friendly spirit with which you have for so many years cooperated with this Government.

I should like to take the occasion to extend to you personally my cordial good wishes for your future happiness and success.

Very sincerely yours,

STATEMENT BY SECRETARY HULL, NOVEMBER 18 [9]

The Secretary of State, on board the steamship American Legion at sea, telegraphed the following statement to the Department of State on November 18:

"I am gratified to learn that the peoples of the United States and Russia, after a frank exchange of views at Washington, have resumed normal relations and that the preliminary basis agreed upon is substantially that indicated before I left Washington. The badly confused world situation will be improved by this natural and timely step which is proof of the marked progress possible in all international dealings when there exists such splendid initiative as that displayed by the President and the mutual disposition and will to approach serious world problems in a friendly and fearless spirit."

CIRCULAR INSTRUCTIONS TO ALL AMERICAN DIPLOMATIC MISSIONS, NOVEMBER 17 [10]

The Acting Secretary of State, Mr. William Phillips, on November 17, sent the following circular to all diplomatic missions:

"Following an exchange of communications between the President and the Commissar for Foreign Affairs of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, covering outstanding questions in the relations between the United States and the Soviet Union and the arrival at an understanding with respect to methods of settling the question of debts and claims, the President communicated to Mr. Litvinoff in a note dated November 16, 1933, the decision of the Government of the United States to establish diplomatic relations with the Soviet Union.

"In view of the recognition thus accorded by the Government of the United States to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, you should enter into cordial official and social relations with your Soviet colleague in accordance with the established practice of the post at which you are stationed.

"Soviet passports should be treated henceforth as passports of other recognized governments.

"Inform consuls."

STATEMENT BY ACTING SECRETARY PHILLIPS, NOVEMBER 22 [11]

In accordance with the joint statement by the President and Mr. Litvinoff of November 16, 1933, further discussions have taken place between Mr. Litvinoff and officials of the Department of State and the Treasury Department. Due to the intricacy of the questions to be explored, it has been impossible to reach definite conclusions before the departure of Mr. Litvinoff. The discussions will be actively continued by officials of both Governments. The conversations which have thus far taken place have shown a desire on the part of both Governments to reach a speedy solution of these questions.

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND MR. LITVINOFF, NOVEMBER 22 AND 23 [12]

WASHINGTON, November 22, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On leaving the United States I feel it a great pleasure respectfully to convey to you my feelings of high esteem as well as gratitude for the many tokens of attention and friendship you have been good enough to show me during my stay in Washington.

I also wish hereby to thank the whole Executive and its various organs for their courtesies and cares.

I avail myself of this opportunity to express once more my firm conviction that the official linking of our two countries by the exchange of notes between you, Mr. President, and myself will be of great benefit to our two countries and will also be conducive to the strengthening and preservation of peace between nations toward which our countries are sincerely striving. I believe that their joint efforts will add a creative factor in international affairs which will be beneficial to mankind.

Believe me to be, my dear Mr. President, with the best wishes for the well being of yourself, your family and of your great country,

Yours very sincerely,

MY DEAR MR. LITVINOFF: I thank you for your most courteous letter of November 22, 1933. APPENDIX

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN SECRETARY HUGHES AND MR. BAKHMETEFF, APRIL 28 AND 29, 1922 [13]

RUSSIAN EMBASSY,
Washington, April 28, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: In view of recent events I think it advisable to bring forward once more the subject of my position as the representative of Russia in the United States.

Received at Washington in July 1917 as Ambassador of the first democratic government of Russia, I have remained at my post up to the present time in order to serve and protect Russian national interests and to facilitate, in cooperation with the treasury and state departments, the liquidation and final settlement of a large volume of commercial business for which the Government of Russia stood obligated, partly through my agency, to American business concerns. I am happy to believe that American as well as Russian interests have been served thereby.

The work of liquidation has now been brought to a practical close. At the same time my status as Ambassador has been made the subject of renewed discussion. I am led to question whether my continuance, as Ambassador of Russia, will longer serve the best interests of my country and the convenience of the United States Government. I am prepared if the United States Government so desires, to retire and terminate my official functions.

On account of personal matters I have planned to sail from this country within the near future. It would be necessary to wind up my affairs and to arrange for the custody of the Russian property for which I am responsible. This work could be completed about the 30th of June, which date could be regarded as the date on which my retirement from official duties would take effect.

In the event of my retirement I suggested that Mr. Serge Ughet, financial attaché of the Embassy, be recognized as custodian of the properties in question and as the agent through whom pending business can be transacted and terminated.

In assuring you of my deep appreciation of the personal consideration I have always enjoyed at the hands of the State Department, and other Departments of the American Government, I desire to express also my gratitude for the good will and consideration with which the United States has treated my country. America was first to welcome the advent of democracy in Russia and to recognize the Provisional Government. Since then and throughout Russia's great trial the United States has evidenced deep and sympathetic understanding of Russia's process of transformation and has conserved unbroken faith in the regeneration and happy future of the Russian people. The United States has lent friendly effort in preserving for the Russian people the integrity of their national patrimony and in safeguarding their economic freedom. Finally America has generously come to the relief of suffering and saved millions of Russians from starvation.

For this assistance and support in the hour of distress Russia will conserve eternal gratitude.

I avail myself of the opportunity to express to you, my dear Mr. Secretary, the renewed assurances of my high esteem.

B. BAKHMETEFF.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF STATE,
Department of State.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 29, 1922.

MY DEAR MR. AMBASSADOR: I have received your letter of April 28, 1922, in which you bring forward the question of your status as Ambassador in the United States and suggest that it may be appropriate to have this terminate in the near future, inasmuch as the liquidation and final settlement of the business of the Russian Government in the United States for which you were responsible is now practically completed, and as your continuance as Ambassador under the existing circumstances may give rise to misunderstanding.

I believe that a change in the present situation is desirable and I am glad to be able to concur in your suggestions as to how this may best be brought about.

You will continue to be recognized as Ambassador until June 30 next. After this date the custody of the property of the Russian Government in this country for which you have been responsible will be considered to vest in Mr. Serge Ughet, the Financial Attaché of the Embassy. Mr. Ughet's diplomatic status with this Government will not be altered by the termination of your duties and he will continue to enjoy the usual diplomatic privileges and immunities.

With assurance of my high esteem and appreciating the friendly spirit in which you have dealt with all matters of interest to this Government, I am, my dear Mr. Bakhmeteff,

Very sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

His Excellency Mr. BORIS BAKHMETEFF,
Ambassador of Russia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, my conclusions must be obvious from what I have already said. I concede that the recognition of Russia is exclusively an Executive function and prerogative, and we cannot pass upon it even if we would. The President has acted in his own right and the decision is beyond our recall. That question is not before us. To be sure, we could decline the confirmation of this Ambassador, and then we could decline the confirmation of his successor if such were our wish; but this would not affect the fact of recognition, and we would be in the anomalous position of not having a representative of our own to guard our interests in Moscow but of having a representative of Moscow in the United States. So that even from my viewpoint, were I continuingly suspicious as I have been heretofore, certainly there could be nothing gained by an absence of our representation over there while they have complete representation over here. That would be even worse.

Therefore it seems to me, in the sheer logic of the case as I argue it out to myself and to the Senate, that the act of recognition is complete. It is not a matter upon which the Senate can pass. If the Senate were passing upon that, I am not clear that even now, in the face of these warranties, I would be satisfied to vote in the affirmative. But that thing is done; and on the basis of the official record which is now available to the Senate officially for the first time, it is my conclusion that the best possible protection that can be put into the words of a contract has been written into this agreement between the President and the representative of the Russian Republic. But I should have declined to proceed in the absence of these all-controlling exhibits.

The only remaining question which confronts us is whether Mr. Bullitt is qualified for the position.

I confess that he is still somewhat of a mystery man to me, in the language of the Senators from Indiana and Minnesota. I confess that I still find him about as mysterious as the distinguished Senator from Arkansas, the Democratic leader, himself found him in his speech last February. Nevertheless, in fairness, I must state that I was very much impressed with his presence before the committee. He appeared to have a complete grasp of his problem. He appears to be a very able man. At any rate, he is the chosen representative of the President of the United States, and I find no adequate reasons submitted to the committee for opposing this particular evidence of the President's judgment.

My conclusion is, then, Mr. President, since the official record is now available, and is now part of this consideration by the Senate of these new Russian-American relationships, my conclusion is that as much has been done as could possibly be done to protect us against bad faith and against the jeopardies which heretofore have been feared not only by a majority of Senators but by a majority of the American people.

I reserve my judgment as to the final outcome of the new contact, because everything depends upon the continuity of good faith with which these guaranties are sustained, but in the face of the situation which this develops I shall not oppose the confirmation. It would serve no purpose except to disarm us over there. It would not close the door to their agents over here.

Having thus sounded the warnings which it has seemed to me the situation requires, and having critically surveyed the record, I conclude by saying that since we now are to deal with each other in international relations, we should both seek to deserve the other's confidence. Regardless of my personal attitudes toward this amazing and gigantic Communist adventure in the Old World, I share and express the hope of the President that " the relations now established may forever remain normal and friendly and that our nations henceforth may cooperate for their mutual benefit and for the preservation of the peace of the world."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana obtained the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for just a moment while I make an explanation with regard to a subject brought out by the Senator from Michigan, I would like to say that the Senator from Michigan has referred to a request for all the correspondence in this matter. I immediately communicated with the Acting Secretary of State over the telephone. He assured me, as we were assured by Mr. Bullitt, that the entire correspondence was covered in this bulletin before us, and that he would immediately send it up here, and that he would later certify to us that that was all. I expect that probably there is in my office now a certificate to that effect.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada, the able Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, permit me to ask him whether he does not think it is highly useful that the basis of this contact should be thus in the official records of the Senate and of the Government, so that there can be no question whatever as to what impulses have moved us to surrender our prejudices and consent to this act?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am in entire accord with that, but I think that the Senator has made such a clear analysis of not only the motives that move him in this matter but undoubtedly those which moved the President in the matter, and will actuate me in my vote here, that it is wholly unnecessary for me to go further in the matter. I will say, however, that in the haste to put the matter into the possession of the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Indiana I asked the Secretary to send the matters up immediately. I have requested, further, that for the permanent records of the committee and of the Senate these matters be certified under seal, simply for future information.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have no desire at all to delay action on this question, but this affords the only opportunity one may have in this body to register a protest against the recognition of Russia.

It has been said that recognition is a Presidential function, that the President has acted in the matter, and that it is an accomplished fact. That is probably true. The Senate perhaps has no voice in the matter, nor, unfortunately, have the American people any voice in the matter. But I think it is well at this time, purely for emphasis, if for no other reason, to suggest some of the dangers we now encounter in recognizing the soviets.

I shall oppose the confirmation of Mr. Bullitt for two reasons: First in order to express my protest and opposition against Russian recognition in any form; and, second, because in my own mind, after the most deliberate consideration, I am convinced that Mr. Bullitt is not the man to act as our Ambassador over there.

The chief reason advanced for recognition of Russia is that it will give additional trade advantages which we do not now possess. I am frank to say that I do not have much confidence in that view. I am unable to get excited about foreign markets. In normal times the American market consumes 93 to 95 per cent of all American production. The best year we have ever had, so far as world trade is concerned, was 1928, and in that year less than 6½ per cent of all American production was sold abroad. Therefore the problem for us is to restore the American market; and when we restore the American market, we will restore American prosperity, and not before. To restore the American market we must take the people off the streets who are now looking for jobs, with none to be found, and give them permanent employment, so that they can purchase American goods.

Now it is proposed to lend to Russia approximately a half billion dollars. I have no official sanction for that statement, but it has been widely published that a large amount of credit would now be given to the Russians with which to buy our goods. The experience of all other countries has been that the Russians sold far more of their commodities in the market of the country recognizing Russia than they were able to sell to Russia. Russia now owes us some $700,000,000, which remains due and unpaid. If we lend them now a half billion dollars, or any sum, the chances are it will never be repaid, judging the future by the past, and then Russia will have both the goods and the money, and we will be holding the bag. All the goods they send to us, in any event, will just go that much further toward demoralizing the already demoralized American market and will result in throwing thousands of additional workers in this country out of employment. Therefore I fail to see where there are any trade advantages to be gained. Italy tried it and, according to an Associated Press dispatch which I quoted here once before, very briefly, published in the Washington Star:

> Italy will call a halt on trade with the Soviets after 2 years. Her experiences with that country have been unhappy. Italy paid in cash, while Russia paid in credit, running from 9 to 52 months. Russia got the lion's share of the trade, and thereby chalked up a balance heavily unfavorable to Italy.

The dispatch adds:

> Russia got the lion's share of the trade and Italy is left holding the bag with a half billion lire in promissory notes. Other countries have had similar experiences.

Mr. President, 1928 was not only our best year so far as world trade was concerned, but it was the best year of all other countries of the world. In that year, for instance, the total amount of world trade aggregated $68,000,000,000. Last year the total world trade amounted to only $28,000,000,000, a reduction of $40,000,000,000 since 1928.

I grant that perhaps some of that might be accounted for by the depression, but most of it is accounted for by this fact—that other nations are becoming more self-contained than ever before; and today, while other nations are increasing tariffs and raising high embargoes against foreign goods coming in to disturb their own markets, this country, after the idea largely has been abandoned by the rest of the world, plunges further into internationalism than ever before. In other words, world trade has been largely reduced in these latter years. Each nation is becoming more independent and is trying to preserve its own markets. The United States, on the other hand, now seems to become more international-minded than ever before, and opens up her markets to the rest of the world when the rest of the world close their markets to us. That policy will never assist in bringing prosperity to this country. Mr. President, I shall say no more on that phase of the question.

There is a very grave matter involved here, however, one that I am very reluctant to discuss, but which I think should be mentioned. If the administration were bound to recognize Russia at some time or another, it seems to me it has chosen the worst time in all the world to bring about that recognition. Everyone sitting here today knows the delicate situation in the Far East. We have vast possessions out there, and God knows the American people want no war with any country.

The Japanese question is always dangerous, and I warn Senators here today that it was never more dangerous than at the present moment. I need not suggest to Members of this body that America is not prepared for war with any country; certainly not with a country 9,000 miles from our shores, with a navy better at the moment than ours, and with our possessions lying all around the doorstep of that powerful country. We are not prepared to finance a war with a Budget of over $7,000,000,000 facing us, and a bonded indebtedness within the next year or so of approximately $32,000,000,000—more than $5,000,000,000 higher than the peak of the war-time indebtedness.

Everybody knows how sensitive are the Japanese people. I have been amazed, therefore, Mr. President, that any gesture would be made that might offend them in the slightest degree.

Out there are the Philippines, with a problem unsettled by us, which will require years in the settlement. A vast empire that archipelago represents in itself. Seven thousand islands and a garrison of 6,000 men—not one man for each island. Under the Washington Conference treaty we are not permitted to fortify anything that we have there. An easy prey to an oriental country or power.

There is Guam, but a few hundred miles away, looking to us for protection, and a possession of this country.

There is our farthest outpost in the Pacific, Pearl Harbor, in the Hawaiian Islands, 2,100 miles west of San Francisco.

And there is Alaska, with its wealth of material resources, thoroughly undeveloped, and fewer than 58,000 people living there—about half native and half American. I point out to Senators that the little island of Attu, westernmost of the Aleutian chain, lies less than 800 miles from Japan and more than 2,800 miles from the nearest continental United States port of Seattle. The Japanese are thoroughly familiar with the great circle route, which they use constantly going back and forth from Seattle to Yokohama, the seaport of Tokyo, traversing Alaskan waters constantly, their naval officers understanding thoroughly all the problems involved in those waters that are but poorly charted, while our Navy has spent little time up there.

Newspapers are on the streets this afternoon quoting high Japanese authorities with the statement they are now preparing for war against the United States because of the Russian question.

I am perfectly willing to concede that it is within the discretion of the President to do as he chooses with executive authority, but I am still unwilling to say that the Senate of the United States has no responsibility in the matter in protecting the rights of the American people. I have a notion that this is one of the gravest responsibilities that ever confronted the Senate. Members of this body, have a care!

I recognize that one may easily be charged with being an alarmist, but we have enough trouble on our hands here with the domestic situation without becoming involved in foreign affairs, additional foreign entanglements, possible foreign alliances, and possible foreign wars, which we should avoid as far as possible.

I wish to point out also that we have an Asiatic station out there. Vessels of the American fleet make their summer headquarters at Shanghai and their winter quarters at Manila—an easy prey for a powerful country in the Orient at any moment.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think for this very grave reason Russian recognition is a terrific mistake, filled with dire possibilities, for the American people that none of us like to contemplate—indeed we scarcely dare contemplate. I therefore wish to register my opposition against recognition, even though I stand alone.

There is another reason, Mr. President. I shall not explore it at length. It has all been gone over time and again on the floor of the Senate. I have reference, of course, to the fact that the home as an institution, and in which the American people believe, has been destroyed over there. They have destroyed the right to worship God according to the dictates of one's own conscience over there; and if one were to concede that they have the right to do as they please in their own country, and order their domestic affairs as they see fit, the fact remains that they have no right to foist their ideas and their philosophy on this country. That I think, within the minds of everybody here, is precisely what they have been trying to do throughout the years and will continue trying to do with their subversive propaganda.

Another reason is that mentioned by the very able Senator from Michigan: The fact that communistic propaganda is wide-spread in this country, emanating from Moscow; and no matter what promises they may make, Mr. President, the fact remains that they have not kept their word with any country during the past 10 years.

The experiences of Great Britain, and of France, and of Italy, and of China, and Japan, and of the United States—all are in the same direction. They do not keep their word. Indeed within the last year one of their most powerful leaders has made the statement that they reserve the right to repudiate their word whenever it suits them or their interests to do so. "Sign anything", they say, in effect, "in order to get advantages for us, but let it be understood that we will repudiate our word and our signature whenever we see fit to do so." That is substantially the Russian position and the position of their leaders today in their international dealings with other countries.

Before I conclude on this phase of the subject, let me say that no one is deceived on this proposition. The Third International and the Soviet system are one and the same. the Third International has its headquarters in Moscow. It is financed by the Moscow Government, and it will continue its propaganda against this country and its institutions in the future just indeed as it has done in the past. So I am convinced in my own mind that Russian recognition is utterly inimical to the best interests of the American people.

I proceed now, Mr. President, to the second reason for my objection to this confirmation. I want to mention Mr. Bullitt. Mr. William C. Bullitt has been nominated by the President to be our first Ambassador to Russia under the new regime. I have no personal animosity against Mr. Bullitt. Let that be understood clearly. I have but the slightest acquaintance with him. So that anything I say with reference to Mr. Bullitt is said in an impersonal sense. I am just standing on the record he has made to date.

All of us are familiar with his perambulations over Europe within the last 12 months, back and forth from capital to capital, whispering to this prime minister here and to that cabinet member there, from one country to the other, proposing reductions in the foreign debts due this country and other matters that have leaked out. On this floor on February 2 last, just a few months ago, I quoted from a Universal Service cable, which I read now because it has a direct bearing on this man's qualifications:

BERLIN, February 1.—William C. Bullitt, America's self-described secret emissary—

This was more than a month before the change in the administration here. Most of us thought that Herbert Hoover was still President of the United States at that time; yet Mr. Bullitt, representing no one except the incoming administration if his intimations are to be believed, though that was denied by the then President-elect, was going about Europe just the same apparently in an official capacity.

William C. Bullitt, America's self-described secret emissary, paid calls in German official quarters here Monday and then left for Vienna, it was learned today.

Covering his tracks under an assumed name, Bullitt came from London and Paris, where he talked with Prime Minister MacDonald and French Premier Paul-Boncour.

In Berlin he called on Foreign Minister Von Neurath and the chief of the American division in the German Foreign Office.

London and Paris dispatches state Bullitt described himself in those capitals as a representative of President-elect Roosevelt, despite Roosevelt's denial Bullitt or anyone else was representing him.

Bullitt registered in Berlin under another name and asked that his presence be kept secret. He expressed himself bitterly over what he termed the London "indiscretions" which exposed his mission.

Mr. President, a man who goes around in disguise under an assumed name, dealing with various governments abroad with no official credentials himself, certainly is reflecting no credit on this country. The amazing thing to me is that he ever became identified with the State Department, and so soon after Mr. Roosevelt's inauguration.

Under a Paris date line of January 27, 1933, is a story reading as follows:

Premier Paul-Boncour tonight reluctantly admitted he has discussed the Franco-American war-debt situation with William C. Bullitt, America's self-described secret emissary.

He declined to discuss the report that Bullitt had left him confidently expecting a Washington invitation within 15 days to join in debt negotiations.

I do not know that Mr. Bullitt knew what he was talking about over there 2 months, or nearly so, before President Roosevelt came into office, but we all do know as a matter of common knowledge that the invitations were sent out to foreign governments whose representatives came here to discuss the debts. We are all aware of the fact, too, that no sooner had the new administration come into office than this same Mr. Bullitt, who had been traveling around over Europe in disguise and under an assumed name, was given one of the principal offices in the State Department. Then came the Russian negotiations, and now, I think to the surprise of the American people but not to the surprise of some of us who had followed developments rather closely, he becomes the first Ambassador to Russia under the new administration.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not interested in the newspaper articles, but I think possibly the Senator has made an inaccurate statement in this respect. None of the nations which came here for the informal conference were invited to discuss war debts according to the official invitation. The invitations were to come and discuss preparations looking to the agenda of the World Economic Conference. I was unofficially invited to all of the conferences that took place. There was once or twice some effort on the part of representatives of certain governments to raise the debt question, but they were told instantly that matter was not on the agenda and was not subject to discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. The Senator knows much better than I what took place, because I was not present. I think the general impression was that, among other things, the debts were to be discussed. I am in no position to say that they were discussed to the exclusion of all else, and doubtless what the Senator said is the correct version of the matter. In any event, I think enough indictments can be urged against Mr. Bullitt, because of the record he has made during the past year, to show that he ought not to be named as Ambassador to Russia in these trying times.

Within the last few days most of us have seen newspaper reports—I do not know that they are true, but I have read some of them, as I assume other Senators have—to the effect that Mr. Bullitt has very recently said that Russia was prepared for war with Japan, that Russia was not afraid of Japan, or something to that effect. It is always dangerous to attempt to quote the language of someone else without the actual statement. I am trying to state substantially what he was reported to have said. I think that is a grave indiscretion, if it be true that he made any such statement. I do not think he ought to discuss the Russian-Japanese matter in any sense of the word. It is delicate enough as it is. Nor do I think we should be drawn into it in any manner.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say on the subject. I want to make it clear that I am opposed to Russian recognition in any form. While I have no better means of knowing how the people feel about it than any other Senator, it is my opinion that the great majority of the American people are opposed to Russian recognition; that if a vote were to be taken on it throughout the country it would result overwhelmingly against any such recognition. Now that recognition has been accorded, however, by the Chief Executive, it remains for this body to express itself in the only manner it can; that is by a vote on the confirmation of Mr. Bullitt.

Because I am opposed to Russian recognition, in the first place, for the reasons stated, and for others I shall not take the time to mention, and because I am opposed to Mr. Bullitt because of the record he has made during the past year, believing that he is not fitted for the position, I shall vote against his confirmation if a yea-and-nay vote is taken. If no yea-and-nay vote is taken, I adopt this means of registering my protest.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate for detaining them at this late hour. I do so only because on a number of occasions, both in the Senate and elsewhere, I have opposed the recognition of the Soviet Government. The policy of our Government toward Russia which was announced by President Wilson met my approval. This policy was stated in an able state paper during the closing months of Mr. Wilson's administration. That policy was followed by Presidents Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. Mr. Justice Hughes, when Secretary of State, in a notable statement, supported and emphasized it, and elaborated the reasons upon which it rested.

I visited Russia a number of years ago, where I spent several months and traveled between eight and nine thousand miles in that country. I met many of the leaders of the Bolshevik regime and also millions of the Russian people. I stated to a number of those holding official positions in the Soviet Government, that if certain conditions were accepted by that Government, I would favor a policy that would lead to recognition. I regret that the Soviet leaders indicated their opposition to their acceptance. Changes have taken place in Russia since I was there, and particularly during the past 4 or 5 years. President Roosevelt undoubtedly believed the time had come for recognition to be accorded to the Soviet Government.

Several months ago it became evident that negotiations would be entered upon between representatives of the United States and the Soviet Government looking to an agreement under which diplomatic relations between the two Governments would be brought about. In view of the position which I had taken in the matter of recognition and the conversations which I had had with representatives of the Soviet Government, when in Russia, I took the liberty of submitting a memorandum to our Government, a copy of which is as follows:

No circumstances have arisen to date that would alter my attitude heretofore expressed in the Senate and elsewhere on the question of recognition by the United States of the Soviet Government in Russia.

I have always felt the most profound sympathy for the Russian people and have entertained keen regret that they should be subjected to a regime of political and economic dictatorship represented by the present authority in Russia. I have believed that as an American I have no right to interfere with the internal, political, or economic affairs established and maintained by another sovereign nation.

On the other hand, I have always contended that recognition of a foreign government by our Government is not a duty nor an obligation on our part but an act of policy dictated by considerations which appear to be in our best interest.

I supported the position of President Wilson in refusing to recognize the Bolshevik regime and after having visited Russia, where I spent several months and traveled more than 8,000 miles, I was more firmly convinced that the best interests of our country would not be served by extending recognition to the Soviet Government until and unless that Government should change its policy with respect to internal affairs as well as external matters, and, moreover, that it should give ample and convincing proof of its intention to assume in its international relations a clear obligation to act in accordance with the generally recognized standards of friendly intercourse among nations.

I am, therefore, opposed to extending recognition to the Soviet Government until such proof is forthcoming.

If it should become the policy of our Government to reconsider at this time our official attitude toward the Soviet Government, our first step should be the creation of a competent commission to ascertain, both independently and in consultation with the representatives of the Soviet Government, the necessary facts upon which a judgment can be based as to whether or not the Soviet Government is prepared, in fact, to assume international obligations common to all civilized nations.

Specifically, before extending recognition to the Soviet Government, we should know: (1) Whether or not that Government is prepared to undertake to conduct no subversive propaganda in our country or our Territorial possessions, either directly through its accredited representatives, or indirectly through such an agency as the Third Internationale; (2) whether or not that Government is prepared to and will dissociate itself from the Third Internationale, and will agree to no longer subsidize it or contribute to its maintenance or activities; (3) whether or not that Government is prepared to and will guarantee an open, public, and fair trial to any American citizen who may be charged with the violation of any law, rule, or regulation of such Government; (4) whether or not that Government is prepared to and will recognize former subjects of Russia who are naturalized American citizens as American citizens and will accord to them all the rights of American citizens; (5) whether or not that Government is prepared, with respect to the war loans extended by our Treasury to fully accredited representatives of the Russian Government then in power, to place itself on the same footing as all the other governments which had borrowed from us during the war—that is, to acknowledge the obligation and to enter into proper negotiations for the discharging of such obligation; and (6) whether or not that Government is prepared to enter into negotiations for the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens who had suffered property damage because of acts initiated and carried out by authority of that Government.

The willingness of the Soviet Government to assume the undertakings herein enumerated should be embodied in formal declarations, precedent to our act of recognition.

I will pause to add parenthetically that substantially the conditions to which I challenged the attention of the President and the State Department have been, I am glad to say, embodied in the agreements which were entered into.

The experience of other important nations, notably Great Britain and France, which had recognized the Soviet Government unconditionally, should serve as sufficient warning to us as to the difficulty of protecting and maintaining our national interests in the face of the international policies pursued by the Soviet Government in the absence of previous clearly defined undertakings on the part of that Government.

It is often asserted that recognition of the Soviet Government would result for our country in a large expansion of our export trade to Russia. This, it is held, would be of sufficient benefit to several important branches of agricultural and industrial production in the United States to render the act of recognition a step in the direction of promoting our best national interests.

The truth of this assertion should be another necessary field of inquiry for the American Commission suggested above. From my personal investigation of this subject, I am convinced that no foundation whatever exists for the extravagant claims advanced in favor of outstanding trade benefits that would accrue to us as a result of our extending recognition to the Soviet Government.

The possibility of our purchases from Russia, the proceeds of which could be used to pay for our exports to that country, is admittedly very limited. Our sales to Russia, over and above our purchases from her, would have to be governed by one of the following factors: (1) A net balance in favor of Russia in her trade with her principal customers, that is, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and France; (2) exports of gold by her; and (3) new credits extended to her in this country.

I am credibly informed that for some time ahead any visible net balance in favor of Russia in her trade with the principal European nations is bound to be absorbed by her payments to these countries on account of credits already extended to her by their citizens. Similarly, her stocks and current production of gold are relatively small.

Hence, there would appear to be but a slight businesslike basis for the extension to her of any substantial volume of new credits.

All these questions will have to be thoroughly and authoritatively investigated before adequate judgment can be formed as to whether or not the recognition of the Soviet Government would, in fact, be in our best economic interest. Surely no officials of our Government would be so oblivious of the disastrous consequences of our huge loans to foreign countries during the postwar years as to lay the foundation for a resumption of substantial loans abroad without a most careful investigation as to the soundness of such investments.

In short, an unconditional recognition of the Soviet Government, prior to an adequate and authoritative investigation and unaccompanied by a definite assumption by the Soviet Government of trustworthy undertakings along the lines here suggested, would be a rash and precipitate action, likely to be profoundly deplored all too soon after it is taken.

Mr. President, the President of the United States, as has been so well stated by the able Senator from Michigan, and also by the Senator from Indiana, undoubtedly has the power under the Constitution to recognize foreign governments.

Perhaps the time has come to change. At any rate, I am accepting as a fait accompli the action taken by the President of the United States. Substantially all the guaranties I suggested in the memorandum are incorporated in the agreements which have been entered into.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the relations between our Government and the Soviet Government will be attended with happy results. For the Russian people I entertain a high regard. They possess admirable qualities and capacity for great achievement. Under a liberal and progressive government they will go far and will materially contribute to the world's development.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the selection of Mr. Bullitt for the post of Ambassador to Russia was most fortunate. I know of no person in the United States that is as well acquainted with conditions in Russia and with the officials of the Soviet Government as Mr. Bullitt, and I think President Roosevelt made a wise choice in selecting him. I am sure he will properly guard and protect the interests of our Government and will be an important factor in the promotion of friendly relations between the Russian people and the United States. I shall be pleased to vote for his confirmation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of William Christian Bullitt to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics?

The nomination was confirmed.

STATE DEPARTMENT—DIPLOMATIC AND FOREIGN SERVICE

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Hal H. Sevier, of Texas, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to Chile.

The nomination was confirmed.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a summary of data concerning the pending treaty, which accompanied the President's message sent to the Senate on yesterday, be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the summary was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SUMMARY OF REPORTS AND DATA RELATIVE TO THE GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT

The following pages summarize the results of a survey of the economic aspects of the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project.

The basic data are presented in separate reports prepared by the agencies cooperating in the survey, consisting of 2,000 pages of text and tables, illustrated with charts and maps.

THE SEAWAY

In order to appraise a project of such magnitude as the proposed seaway, the investigation was necessarily addressed to answering certain questions:

(1) Is the region affected by the project of sufficient importance in terms of population, manufacturing output, agriculture, available ports, and trade, to assure a flow of goods via the waterway to and from other areas of economic importance both as sources of commodities and as markets?

(2) Are there commodities already moving in and out of the region in quantity, which may be counted upon to move more freely, if the proposed project offers cheaper transportation?

(3) To what extent will the proposed waterway open up a new coast line to ocean commerce and in what quantities are commodities of various classes and descriptions available as potential cargo for vessels using the new route?

(4) What savings are likely to be obtained on shipments via the proposed waterway as compared with the cost of shipping via present available routes, and what effect on the economic well-being of the region and the country as a whole may be expected?

(5) What work is necessary to complete the proposed waterway and will the cost be justified when viewed in terms of the expected savings?

(6) In what way and to what extent will the proposed waterway affect other parts of the country and other transportation interests?

The reports here summarized provide, as nearly as possible, accurate answers to these questions in terms of facts gathered by Government agencies.

The proposed waterway improvement and its cost

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway is already in existence. Its development is not a question of initiating, but rather of completing, a project in the improvement of which the United States and Canada have whole-heartedly cooperated for generations. The vessels of both countries have navigated its waters freely and with equal rights since the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842. Throughout this entire period it has been in the truest sense an international highway, unique in the fact that for more than a century no warship has floated in its waters. The United States and Canada have already, with common accord, expended many millions of dollars in its improvement and it now carries an enormous tonnage even in its most restricted sections.

The waterway, which now extends from Duluth-Superior at the western end of the Great Lakes system to the Atlantic Ocean, a distance of 2,350 miles, has already been improved to a minimum depth of 21 feet except in the relatively short section of the St. Lawrence River which lies between Prescott-Ogdensburg and Montreal. In this 120-mile section there are now 47 miles of 14-foot canals. This constricted section forms a bottle neck which prevents the passage of ordinary ocean-going vessels and makes the port of Montreal virtually the head of ocean navigation and the transshipment point for inbound and outbound commerce.

The pending Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty is in substance an agreement between the United States and Canada to complete the improvement of the existing waterway to provide a minimum depth of 27 feet from the Great Lakes ports to the Atlantic Ocean.

The major portion of the work provided for in the treaty between the United States and Canada will be done in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River, which forms the boundary between the State of New York and the Province of Ontario. Here two great dams will be constructed converting the existing turbulent rapids into deep pools where navigation will be unrestricted. Ocean-going vessels will be passed around these dams by canals having a total length of 10 miles with three locks capable of handling large ocean-going vessels without delay. The dams will also be used to generate 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy which will be shared equally between the United States and Canada.

The completed seaway from Duluth to the Atlantic Ocean will provide a waterway in which vessels may move with unrestricted speed over approximately 97 percent of the total distance. The time required for navigation by ordinary cargo vessels is estimated at approximately 9 days. From Chicago to the Atlantic Ocean the distance and time of navigation will be very nearly the same. The distance and time of navigation from lake ports farther east will be proportionately less.

Full details are given in the several reports as to the barriers which remain to be removed and the works required to complete the seaway.

Attention is particularly directed to the fact that, estimating the capacity of the present St. Lawrence canals as about 9,000,000 tons of commerce annually, it appears that the capacity of the existing waterway is largely absorbed by the commerce of today and that, with the return of normal conditions, it is likely to be exceeded. In 1928 the traffic on these canals amounted to approximately 8,400,000 tons. This may be compared with approximately 10,400,000 tons carried through the Panama Canal in vessels of less than 25-foot draft in the same year. In 1929 the traffic through the St. Lawrence canals declined to less than 6,000,000 tons but it has been steadily increasing as a result of the opening of the new Welland Ship Canal in 1930 to restricted navigation. It would appear, therefore, that the existing 14-foot St. Lawrence canals must be speedily enlarged, if serious congestion of commerce is to be avoided.

The annual capacity of the proposed Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway is conservatively estimated by the Corps of Engineers at 25,000,000 tons. In comparing this capacity with the tonnage now passing through the most restricted section of the waterway, it may be noted that the tonnage of the 14-foot St. Lawrence canals increased from approximately 2,000,000 tons in 1908 to 8,400,000 in 1928. This represents an increase of 320 percent during the 20 years, or at the rate of approximately 16 percent per annum. It will hardly be questioned that the growth of traffic in the enlarged channels of the seaway will be even more rapid than it has been in the restricted channels of the existing canals. But even on the assumption of the continuance of the past trend, the proposed capacity of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway would be completely utilized in less than 25 years.

The total United States share of the cost of completing this waterway to open the Great Lakes to ocean-going commerce under the treaty is estimated at $272,453,000, including the development of 1,100,000 horsepower on the United States' side of the International Rapids. Of this it is proposed, under the terms of the joint resolution which has already passed the House of Representatives, that $89,726,750 be assumed by the State of New York as representing the cost which may fairly be allocated to the power project. This would place the total net cost to the United States for the entire project, under the treaty, at $182,726,250.

The annual cost of the seaway to the United States, including interest at 4 percent, amortization of 50 years, operation and maintenance, is estimated by the Corps of Engineers at $9,300,000. This amounts to an annual cost of 7.4 cents per capita for the population of the United States and 23.2 cents per capita for the seaway area.

The new seacoast

Completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project will create a new seacoast for the United States, 3,576 miles in length of shore line, reaching into the heart of the Nation and converting 30 American cities located on the Lakes and connecting channels into seaports. As a result, 28 of the 48 States will share in the extended coast line of the United States.

The following Great Lakes ports, whose foreign and coastwise water-borne commerce in 1931 exceeded 500,000 short tons, may be expected to secure increased water-borne commerce as a result of the completion of the seaway: Duluth, Minn.; Ashland, Green Bay, Manitowoc, Milwaukee, and Superior, Wis.; Calumet and Chicago, Ill.; Gary and Indiana Harbor, Ind.; Calcite, Detroit, Escanaba, Marquette, and Saginaw, Mich.; Ashtabula, Cleveland, Conneaut, Fairport, Huron, Lorain, Sandusky, and Toledo, Ohio; Erie, Pa.; Buffalo and Rochester, N.Y.

Opening up this region which has a capacity of production and consumption comparable with the North Atlantic States must result in benefits not only to these ports and their adjoining territory but also to the Nation as a whole.

The seaway area

The seaway area is defined by a line on the map of the United States bounding the area adjacent to the Great Lakes in which transportation costs to and from the markets of the world would be reduced by the improvement.

This area, on the basis of data in the reports of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, includes the following States in their entirety: Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. It includes also parts of New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana.

The population of the seaway area, exclusive of States only partially included, was 42,470,045 in 1930. This represents approximately 35 percent of the population of the country. It compares with a population of 50,220,680 in the Atlantic area; 19,872,772 in the Gulf area; and 10,211,549 in the Pacific area. For the past 30 years the population of the area has increased almost uniformly at a rate of 13 percent per decade.

If the parts of States not wholly embraced by the seaway area are included, the population to be directly benefited by lower transportation costs totals approximately 45,000,000. This area includes 35 cities of more than 100,000 population.

The value of manufactured products in the area in 1929, exclusive of those States only partially included, totaled $27,040,672,000, or approximately 38 percent of the national total.

If all the counties of other States included in the seaway area, as delimited on the map prepared by the United States Engineers, are included in the seaway area, the combined value of manufactured products in this area totaled $32,600,499,000 in 1929, or 46 percent of the total for the United States as a whole. This manufacture involved the purchase of raw materials of a total value of $18,277,951,000, or 47 percent of the total value of all raw materials purchased by factories throughout the country.

Of the 17 States which lead the country in factory production, 9 are wholly and 2 are partially within the seaway area.

The agricultural production of the country is also largely centered in the seaway area. The States wholly within the area contain 52 percent of all the crop land, 51 percent of the total value of farm property, 50 percent of the total value of livestock, 52 percent of the dairy cows, 72 percent of the swine, 66 percent of the butter output, and 49 percent of the egg production.

In grain crops this region produces 76 percent of the corn, 64 percent of the wheat, and 84 percent of the oats raised in the United States.

The wholesale and retail trade in the seaway area affords a basis for appraising the demand for foreign and domestic imports.

The wholesale trade of the area in 1929 (including only those States wholly within it) totaled $22,727,535,000 out of a country-wide total of $69,291,547,000. If the portions of other States, which are within the area, are included, the total amounted to $26,689,866,000, or 38.5 percent of the total for the country as a whole.

The retail trade of the area presents the same impressive picture of a market which will be benefited by the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. In 1929 the retail trade of the area amounted to $19,828,701,000, representing 40 percent of the retail trade of the United States.

Importance of intercoastal commerce in relation to seaway

The predominance of domestic over foreign commerce in the water-borne commerce of the United States is a highly important factor which must be considered in appraising the effect of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway on the several coast lines and ports interested directly or indirectly in the development.

In the 10 years, 1923 to 1932, inclusive, the domestic coastwise and intercoastal trade of the country comprised approximately four fifths of the total water-borne commerce. In other words, the volume of domestic commerce was four times as great as that of foreign commerce. This is important because the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will render one of the country's greatest economic areas accessible to intercoastal as well as to foreign water-borne commerce.

The predominance of domestic commerce over foreign is not only characteristic of the water-borne commerce of the United States as a whole, but also of the various separate coasts and ports. Thus, in 1930, the ratio of domestic to total water-borne commerce was 82 percent for the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, 70 percent for the ports of the Gulf coast and 84 percent for ports of the Pacific coast. The enormous Great Lakes tonnage is, of course, overwhelmingly domestic (92 percent).

It is reasonable to believe, therefore, that at least 80 percent of the new traffic that will be developed by the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will be domestic commerce moving between the ports on the Great Lakes and the existing ports on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

This suggests that the ports on the other coasts will be more largely benefited by the growth of intercoastal commerce moving via the Great Lake-St. Lawrence waterway than they can be injured by changes in the movement of foreign commerce occasioned thereby. The Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports, with their already important movement of domestic water-borne commerce, will have the added advantage of direct ocean-trade routes to the new Great Lakes-St. Lawrence coast serving an area incomparable both as a source of products and as a market for the goods produced in other areas.

In other words, if it be granted that some of the Atlantic and Gulf ports may suffer some loss of foreign commerce, which now moves through them by a combination of rail and water transportation, this disadvantage would be more than offset by reason of the great increase in domestic commerce with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence ports which will develop as soon as the seaway is opened for navigation.

Potential commerce via seaway

The completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will enable 70 percent of the world's ocean-going freight-cargo tonnage to reach the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River ports which serve the important industrial, agricultural, and commercial area described above. The potential export and import tonnage which will move via the seaway, based on 1929 conditions, is conservatively estimated in a special study prepared by the War Department at 13,000,000 tons, and the savings in transportation costs, as compared with present available routes, at approximately $79,000,000.

These conclusions rest on the following analysis:

The ocean-going merchant marine of the chief maritime nations of the world, consisting of vessels of 2,000 tons or over, as of December 31, 1932, totaled 9,358 vessels with a total tonnage of 51,000,000. Of this total, 6,938 vessels with a total tonnage of 30,000,000 have a draft, fully loaded, of 26 feet or less.

The freight-cargo vessels included in the above total 6,707 vessels with a total tonnage of 31,000,000; of this total, 5,457 with a combined tonnage of 22,000,000 have a draft, fully loaded, of 26 feet or less.

These figures indicate that approximately 60 percent of the world's ocean-going tonnage and 70 percent of its freight-cargo tonnage can utilize the proposed seaway to promote the commerce of the interior of the continent.

Possible export and import commerce over the proposed St. Lawrence waterway, based on 1929 conditions, is estimated at 23,000,000 tons. Certain corrections arbitrarily made in an effort to be conservative reduce this estimate to a more probable figure of 13,000,000 tons. Potential exports via the waterway include wheat and grain products, meats and animal fats, manufactured iron, chemicals, automobiles, agricultural implements, and copper. Potential imports include sugar, rubber and rubber substitutes, coffee, bananas, kaolin, vegetable oil, manganese, and pyrites.

Further analysis reveals that as a whole the potential export and import trade is fairly well balanced, and that even when broken down on a zone basis there is considerable possibility of two-way loading. On the basis on which these estimates are prepared partial loading through the St. Lawrence canals, for vessels of greater draft than indicated by the canal depth, with additional cargo picked up through detour to North Atlantic ports, would be economically profitable whenever the additional pick-up exceeded 300 tons.

An analysis was made of certain commodities which were regarded as important potential tonnage for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. The present costs of transportation of 6 export and 5 import commodities were compared with the possible costs that might result through development of the proposed seaway.

These savings and the basis for the figures arrived at are shown in detail in the report of the War Department. On the basis indicated therein, it is shown that in 1929 there might have been moved over the proposed seaway a total of exports of 7,741,500 tons with a possible saving of $44,810,923, and an import movement of 5,742,333 tons with a possible saving of $34,082,207. It should be noted that these figures are for the year 1929 and are obtained on the basis of the best possible transportation costs and assuming the most favorable conditions.

In the comparisons actual vessel costs were used for both prospective seaway and present ocean transportation. Full vessel loading was also assumed and the figures for tonnage were based on commerce for the calendar year 1929. Full allowance in seaway vessel costs was made for insurance and pilotage, as well as for a reduction in tonnage due to the winter period in which the St. Lawrence will be closed to navigation. In using rail rates commodity rates were used where available.

This saving of over $70,000,000 a year, affecting both the producer and the consumer, is based entirely upon foreign commerce. As stated above, our water-borne foreign commerce is only one fifth of the total water-borne commerce of the United States.

It has been impossible to derive from authentic sources the amount with origin and destination of purely domestic commerce. There are appended in the War Department annex tabulations showing existing ocean-freight rates compared with published tariffs for land transportation. A consideration of the producers' and consumers' market which will be opened up to deep-water transportation by the development of the proposed seaway with a comparison of the land and ocean rates will indicate in some small measure the benefits to domestic commerce which will be developed through the proposed improvement.

Typical savings in such domestic shipments, assuming return cargo available, were $5.44 to $12.64 per ton on lumber from Grays Harbor, Wash., to Detroit, Mich.; $9.332 per ton on class 5 commodities from Philadelphia to Chicago; $84.947 per ton on automobiles from Detroit to Los Angeles.

Coordination of transportation agencies

Adequate appraisal of the proposed seaway must include an attempt to estimate future traffic requirements of the area affected and to allocate such traffic between the seaway and existing transportation agencies. So far as the various indices afford a basis for such an estimate, it is clear that an upward trend is still characteristic both of population and of per capita freight traffic.

Interstate Commerce Commission figures show that railroad freight ton-miles increased from an average of 167,712,000,000 in the 5 years, 1901–5 to an average of 430,378,000,000 for the 5 years, 1926–30 and that, with the exception of the abnormal war period, the rate of increase has been remarkably steady, with no sign of diminution. This is significant in view of the fact that recent years have been characterized by increasing competition on waterways and highways. The trend would indicate a demand for about 650,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight traffic in 1950, an increase of 200,000,000,000 ton-miles as compared with the 1929 peak.

A similar analysis based on population growth and increase in per capita ton-miles of traffic suggests approximately the same conclusion and warrants the conviction that by 1950 the increase in traffic offered to the country's transportation agencies will be at least 30 times the probable traffic via the seaway. If the comparison is limited to the railroads paralleling the proposed seaway, it appears that increased demands for traffic will exceed the potential traffic of the seaway at least 10 times over.

The seaway, then, cannot be viewed as tending to absorb existing railroad tonnage. The problem is in reality one of apportioning new traffic in terms of the economic interest of the country.

This must take account of the fact that increasing traffic has meant increasing traffic density rather than increasing the number of miles of railroad. This is particularly true of the railroads in the eastern district, where the density amounted to 3,195,743 ton-miles per mile of road in 1929 as compared with 1,727,786 ton-miles per mile of road for the country as a whole. On the eastern trunk lines the density of traffic was still greater, amounting to 4,660,584 ton-miles per mile of road for the Pennsylvania in 1929.

The period 1920–29 was characterized by increasing traffic between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts via the Panama Canal, estimated to have saved the country upward of $900,000,000 in freight charges as compared with what it would have cost to ship the same traffic by rail. At the same time inland-waterway commerce was increasing. Yet in that period the railroads showed the best consecutive record of dividend payments in their history, and disbursed a total of more than $10,000,000,000, or an average of over $1,000,000,000 a year, in dividend and interest payments.

Detailed analysis shows that the railroads are not burdened with excess equipment or facilities. Consequently, to meet the increasing traffic requirements of coming years, the country may choose, without injustices to the railroads, whether investment in opening the interior to ocean navigation would not be advisable as part of the necessary increased investment in traffic facilities.

Analysis of the effect of Panama Canal traffic on the western railroads operating in competition with it shows that the traffic through the waterway has been predominantly in heavy, bulky products of low revenue yield, while on the railroads the proportion of relatively higher-yield traffic in manufactured articles has tended to increase. In spite of the growth of intercoastal shipments through the Canal, the western railroads secured an increase both in total traffic and in traffic density as compared with the pre-Canal period.

The gross and net income of the western roads also tended to increase, the net income reaching an all-time peak of $336,769,396 in 1929. This represented an increase of 48 percent over the net income of 1913, the peak prior to the Canal opening.

Judging from the experience of the western roads in competition with the Panama Canal, there is no sound basis for anticipating that the development of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will in any material degree affect adversely either the traffic or the prosperity of the eastern trunk lines that will compete with it. The seaway will handle its share of the heavy, bulky, commodities and leave the railroads free to handle manufacturers' and other relatively higher-yield commodities with greater efficiency. This will benefit rather than injure the roads.

THE POWER PROJECT

The following pages summarize an investigation of the economic aspects of the power projects to be built in the International Rapids section of the St. Lawrence River in conjunction with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway.

The basic data are set forth in a report prepared by the Federal Power Commission and the Power Authority of the State of New York, which includes technical appendixes and illustrative charts.

In order to appraise a power project of such magnitude, the survey was directed to the following questions:

(1) Is the power project an economic undertaking in terms of capital cost per installed horsepower, proportion of primary horsepower to installed horsepower, annual cost per horsepower, including all charges and operating expenses?

(2) To what distance can St. Lawrence power be economically transmitted?

(3) What are the present power facilities of the region and how are they located in relation to the St. Lawrence development? What are the present transmission interconnections?

(4) Are the economic characteristics of the region within transmission distance such as to warrant the conclusion that there will be a market for the power?

Power development under the treaty defined

The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway project does not involve the United States in any expenditure, whatever, for power developments in those sections of the river which are entirely Canadian. The power in the most important Canadian section, i.e., the Soulanges Rapids section, is already being developed by Canadian private interests. This is no concern of the United States under the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project but it does afford a cogent economic reason for the early development of power in the International Rapids section if the United States is to keep pace in providing cheap current for its rural and domestic consumers and for industry.

The St. Lawrence power development, so far as the United States is concerned, involves the development of approximately 1,100,000 horsepower in that section of the river which serves as the international boundary between the State of New York and the Province of Ontario. If the agreement with the New York Power Authority, embodied in the joint resolution which has already passed the House of Representatives, is confirmed that agency will assume responsibility for $89,726,750 of the total United States investment under the treaty. The corresponding power development on the other side of the river will be paid for by the Province of Ontario.

St. Lawrence offers exceptional power resource

The international rapids section of the St. Lawrence River offers an opportunity for hydroelectric power development which is exceptional among the remaining water-power resources of the country. This is so because the Great Lakes provide a 94,000-square-mile storage reservoir which tends to equalize the flow of the river. This means that an unusual proportion of the installed horsepower will be primary power, available all the time, and requiring no investment in storage systems or stand-by steam plants.

Under the treaty power will be developed at two sites. The upper, or Crysler Island Dam, will develop a head of from 19.6 to 24.2 feet. The lower dam will develop a head of from 56.4 to 60.4 feet. The combined total installation to utilize these heads will be 2,199,960 horsepower, of which one half, or approximately 1,100,000 horsepower, will be developed in the United States. It is estimated that on the United States side of the line there will be available 769,562 primary horsepower and 141,798 high-grade secondary power.

This will make possible an annual output of 5,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of primary power, with about 700,000,000 more from the secondary power. The combined total is equivalent to approximately half of all the electricity sold in New York State in 1932.

Cost estimates assure economical power development

The investment of $89,726,750, to be assumed by the New York Power Authority as the share of the total cost of developing the international rapids section allocable to power, will make power available at an investment cost of $81.57 per installed horsepower and $115.74 per primary horsepower. It renders the proposed power development one of the most economical on the continent, comparing with an investment cost of $136 per installed horsepower for the present capacity of Conowingo, $120 for Fifteen Mile Falls, N.H., and $122 at Muscle Shoals. None of these projects has the high proportion of primary power available on the St. Lawrence. Consequently their cost per primary horsepower is far greater.

The cost of generating this power, assuming interest at 4 percent, complete amortization of the investment in 40 years, depreciation, maintenance, and operating expenses, may be estimated as follows:

Annual cost of St. Lawrence power

Interest (4 percent on $89,726,750)	$3,589,070
Amortization	897,268
Depreciation	807,840
Operation and maintenance (2 plants)	800,000
	6,094,178
Cost per primary horsepower year	7.92
Cost per installed horsepower year	5.54

St. Lawrence power, used to carry the base load of a system corresponding with that of the New York Power & Light Corporation, could market 87 percent of its potential kilowatt-hour output. On this basis the generating cost per kilowatt-hour would be about 1.4 mills. On an 80 percent load factor basis it would cost approximately 1.5 mills. These figures make no allowance for the very real value of the secondary power.

Example of St. Lawrence power in combination with steam

Technical studies made for the New York Power Authority show extraordinary economies in possible use of St. Lawrence power in combination with steam-generating capacity. Such a combination would make it possible to utilize to the fullest extent not only the primary but also the secondary power. The steam plants would be used only a portion of the time, when required to carry peak loads. The steam cost figures used in these estimates are based on data furnished by the Niagara Hudson Power Corporation to the St. Lawrence Power Development Commission.

As an example, if combined with 1,780,000 horsepower of steam plant capacity to carry a system with a 45-percent-load factor and load curves corresponding with those of the New York Power & Light Corporation, the St. Lawrence power plants could market nearly 100 percent of their potential primary power output. The combination of hydro and steam would provide an annual output of 7,333,000,000 kilowatt-hours at a cost, with the steam plants privately owned, of $12.23 per horsepower year or about 4.1 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Similar results were obtained on the assumption that 200,000 horsepower was sold to industry near Massena on an 80-percent-load factor basis and the remainder combined with enough steam generating capacity to supply a system with 45-percent-load factor 2,000,000 horsepower of firm power.

These figures, in conjunction with those in the preceding section, indicate that in almost any possible combination St. Lawrence power will be cheap power of the greatest possible value.

Cost of transmission

Special studies have been made of the cost of transmitting that portion of St. Lawrence power which will not be used by industries located near the project. The most exhaustive technical investigation of the problem is that prepared for the Power Authority of the State of New York by E. F. Scattergood, chief electrical engineer and general manager of the Los Angeles Bureau of Power and Light. He was assisted in this analysis by engineers who prepared similar plans and estimates for transmitting Boulder Dam power to Los Angeles.

Mr. Scattergood assumes 300,000 kilowatts transmitted to New York City over 4 straight-of-way 220,000-volt transmission circuits on 2 double-circuit steel-tower transmission lines from the St. Lawrence River to Elmsford and four 132-kilovolt underground cables of 80,000-kilowatt capacity from Elmsford into New York City.

On the above basis, with interest on transmission investment at 4.75 percent the cost of transmission per kilowatt-hour was found to be 2.0855 mills at 80-percent-load factor and 2.7806 mills at 60-percent-load factor. The over-all cost of St. Lawrence power delivered in New York City on this basis would be 4.8125 mills at 80-percent-load factor and 5.0833 mills at 60-percent-load factor.

Comparison with other studies suggests a considerable reduction in the cost of land assumed in this study. If, in addition, the underground transmission into New York City is eliminated, the following conclusions as to the cost of transmitting St. Lawrence power over a publicly owned transmission system appear to be conservative:

(1) St. Lawrence power can be transmitted to southern New York, a distance of approximately 300 miles, with allowance for transmission losses, approximately 2.2 mills at 60-percent-load factor and 1.6 mills at 80-percent-load factor.

(2) St. Lawrence power can be transmitted to the Utica area, a distance of 135 miles, with allowance for transmission losses, for approximately 0.97 mill at 60-percent-load factor and 0.73 mill at 80-percent-load factor.

On the basis of the above conclusions the total cost of St. Lawrence power delivered at the end of the 300-mile transmission line would be 4.20 mills at 60-percent-load factor and 3.13 mills at 80-percent-load factor. The corresponding figures for delivery in the Utica area would be 2.99 mills at 60-percent-load factor and 2.24 mills at 80-percent-load factor.

These calculations are based upon the assumption that the transmission system is used solely to carry St. Lawrence power. Actually, if it is combined with other generating stations, as suggested above, there will be a certain amount of relaying of power in both directions, tending to reduce the cost of transmission.

These figures indicate that St. Lawrence power can be made available within a wide area at so low a cost as to render its development an essential step in providing for the power requirements of the region. It is an economically sound project both in terms of providing for industrial development near the river and for base-load power in conjunction with other plants to a distance of 300 miles from the point of production.

St. Lawrence power market area

The first assurance of a ready market for St. Lawrence power lies in the fact that the area within transmission distance represents one of the most densely populated regions in the country. With an area of 114,835 square miles it contains a population of 24,260,277, representing approximately 20 percent of the entire population of the United States. The density of population is 213 per square mile as compared with 40.5 per square mile for the country as a whole.

The density of manufacturing activity in the St. Lawrence power area is also important as a basis for appraising the potential market for this power. The total value of manufactured products in the area in 1929 amounted to $19,614,432,741, representing 27.8 percent of the value produced by factories throughout the country.

This concentration of manufacturing activity means that the St. Lawrence project will have within transmission distance factories which in 1929 used more than 10,000,000 horsepower of primary energy in the form of electric, steam, and diesel power and expended $422,000,000 in a single year for this power.

In this connection it may be pointed out that all of the States in which there is high per capita manufacturing activity are so located as to benefit from the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence improvement either in its navigation or power aspects. These include New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania in the power zone, and Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan in the seaway zone. Thus the industrial life of the country is so located as to create a cogent argument for the project, from both the power and the navigation angles.

These figures indicate, on the basis of existing population and industrial development, that the St. Lawrence power development is located near a natural market for power. The distribution of industrial activity in the region, however, is not desirable from either an economic or social viewpoint, being heavily concentrated in certain limited areas, especially in the neighborhood of Niagara Falls and in the New York metropolitan area. The proposed St. Lawrence power project will be so located as to remedy this unbalanced condition, tending to encourage industrial development in a part of the State which will secure from the development the advantages of cheap power and ocean shipping.

Generating capacity and power costs in the area

The enormous existing demand for power in the St. Lawrence power transmission area assures its ready absorption through the normal growth of that demand. According to the McGraw Central Station Directory for 1933 the New England and Middle Atlantic States have an electric power generating capacity of 14,831,630 horsepower. Of this total 3,219,237 horsepower is hydroelectric.

For New York State alone the report shows 6,149,931 installed horsepower of which 1,515,204 is generated by water power. Although a certain amount of this generating capacity is unquestionably obsolete or merely stand-by, the figures suggest that a 20-percent increase in the demand for electric power in New York State in the next 7 years would absorb St. Lawrence power. As will be subsequently shown, all trends indicate that the increase in demand will far exceed this.

The figures show, however, that available generating capacity in New York State is concentrated to a very large extent in the New York City and Niagara Falls extremities of the State. These two limited areas have today approximately 75 percent of the State's total generating capacity. This leaves an important region in the State as the natural market for the great bulk of St. Lawrence power.

The development of this region as an industrial market for power will bring with it increase in population, increase in general business activity, greater prosperity for the rural areas, and so will expand the general market for power.

The important generating plants in the State are now interconnected by transmission lines which form a network for the exchange of steam and water generated power. This makes it possible to use effectively the various types of generating facilities to supplement each other. The recent completion of the transmission line between Greenbush in Rensselaer County and the New York City area, completes the tie-up by including the steam plants of New York City.

The records of the New York Public Service Commission for 1930 show 3,665,182 electric customers of public utilities serving New York State alone. To meet the demands of these customers required the production of 11,453,645,139 kilowatt-hours of electrical energy and the purchase of enough additional outside of the State to bring the total to 12,794,287,250. Altogether the State accounted for approximately one seventh of the power used in the United States. An analysis has been prepared showing, for 1930, the generating costs for all power companies serving New York State, on the basis of a 7 percent return on the capital invested in the generating facilities. This required a careful allocation of capital items including organization, franchises, general equipment and other overheads, as well as of general expense items.

The results showed that direct operating expenses for steam-power production by the larger and more modern plants varied from 3.88 mills to 7.25 mills per kilowatt-hour. The average operating expense for all steam plants was 4.6984 mills, and this included no allocated expenses or fixed charges. Including the additional expenses and a 7 percent return on the entire fixed capital properly assignable to the generation of power, the total cost of production for the larger stations varied from 8.11 mills to 12.9 mills. The average cost of steam generation in the State was 10.654 mills.

These figures indicate that St. Lawrence power could be economically substituted for much that is now generated by steam and that an economical plan for meeting this demand for additional generating capacity 10 years ahead must include the immediate initiation of the St. Lawrence power project.

Potential increase in market for power in St. Lawrence power area

An important consideration in any program designed to meet the power requirements of the Nation or any part of it is the time interval which will elapse between the initiation of the plans and the actual delivery of power from the project.

The blocks of power required to meet the increasing demands of a growing population, which at the same time is progressing industrially, are of such magnitude that the necessary provision of generating capacity cannot be met overnight. This is especially true if the people are to take advantage of such extraordinary resources of cheap hydroelectric power as the St. Lawrence.

For this reason it is necessary to examine past growth in demand with a view to determining as far as possible a definite trend.

There are a number of approaches to determining the probable market for St. Lawrence power in the area which it may be expected to serve in the decade, 1941–50. These all necessarily rest on faith that the business depression which began in 1929 and continued into 1933 will eventually be completely liquidated and that the economic well-being and growth of the country will be reestablished.

Some of the factors to be taken into account in such a forecast are:

(1) Growth of population. If the population continues to increase and the per capita use of electricity remains at approximately the present level, then the demand for power in the area will increase at about the rate of population increase.

(2) Increase in per capita use of electricity in the area. If the increase in consumption of power per capita of the population continues, then the demand for power in the area will increase at a rate representing the combination of the upward trends of population and per capita consumption.

(3) Increase in gross generation of power. This shows the results of the combined trend noted above.

(4) Increase in the proportion of homes wired for electricity, with especial reference to the development of rural electrification.

(5) Increase in the average use of electricity per annum in the homes.

(6) Plans of the electrical industry for extending the use of domestic and farm electrical appliances.

(7) Other trends tending to increase the per capita and total demand for electricity, such as substitution of purchased power for existing power plants in industrial establishments, railroad electrification, and development of electrochemical and electrometallurgical industries using large quantities of power.

Broadly speaking, it may be said that every one of these trends is upward and that the prospect is for a greater demand for power by 1940 and 1950 than the conservative estimates below will forecast.

Population growth in the United States as a whole has been analyzed by Thompson and Whelpton in their book, Population Trends in the United States. Based on an extensive analysis of vital statistics they project growth ahead, at a diminishing rate to 1980. Examination of the figures and curves for New York State indicates an almost exact correspondence with the rates of increase for the country as a whole.

Extension of the New York curve on this basis suggests a population increase of 2,150,000 or about 17 percent from 1930 to 1950. If the per capita use of electricity in the State remained static, this increase in population would create a new demand for about 2,500,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The per capita use of mechanical power in the country, however, is steadily increasing, and with it has gone a continuing increase in the proportion of that power derived from central electric generation stations.

In New York State from 1920 annual production of electricity more than doubled, the per capita output rising from 667 kilowatt-hours to 1,163 kilowatt-hours per year. Although the depression brought a slight hesitation in the upward trend, 1933 figures show that it has been resumed.

A chart plotted to indicate the trend indicates a probable per capita production of electricity in New York State of 1,740 kilowatt-hours in 1940.

The assumption of a population of 13,840,000 in 1940 as forecast above and a per capita demand for 1,740 kilowatt-hours in the same year would require provision for generating 24,081,600,000 kilowatt-hours in the State in that year. This would mean an increase of nearly 10,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours over the previous high point, or about twice the estimated output of the proposed St. Lawrence power plants at 100-percent-load factor.

Electrification of the home

Probably the most important factor in the growth of the market for the electrical energy is the increasing use of electricity in homes. This is recognized by the industry itself and is being promoted as the best way of building a stable load.

The act of the New York Legislature creating the Power Authority of the State of New York to undertake the power project is specifically designed to secure the lowest possible rates for domestic and rural consumers in order to encourage the fuller use of electricity in the home and on the farm.

From 1920 to 1930 the number of residential lighting customers in the United States increased from 8,700,000 to 20,149,352. The steady upward trend in the number of residential customers in the States within the St. Lawrence power area corresponds with that in the country as a whole. In New England the number increased from 778,300 in 1920 to 2,234,947 in 1930, while in the Middle Atlantic States the increase was from 1,509,000 to 6,895,089.

The increase in the domestic market for electricity appears in the Edison Electric Institute compilation showing distribution of electrical energy by classes of consumers. From 1920 to 1932 the increase in residential use proceeded without interruption from 2,950,000,000 kilowatt-hours to 11,987,000,000 kilowatt-hours. Average annual use per customer increased from 339 kilowatt-hours in 1920 to 601 kilowatt-hours in 1932.

The present trend in average residential use suggests at least 841 kilowatt-hours per customer in 1940 and 1,103 per customer in 1950. But such a forecast takes no account of the possibility that material reductions in present domestic rate schedules are likely to occur with a resulting major stimulus to the use of electrical appliances. Such a change in the most important single factor affecting the trend would unquestionably cause domestic consumption to approach the average usage prevailing in Ontario.

It may be pointed out, however, that an increase in average domestic usage to 1,100 kilowatt-hours a year, coupled with an increase in the number of customers paralleling the increase in population, would more than double the present domestic market for electricity in New York State. It would mean an added demand for more than 1,800,000,000 kilowatt-hours per year.

Electrical appliances promise expanded market for power

The electrification of the home is becoming more and more a matter of expansion in the use of electrical appliances. The assurance that this trend will continue affords a secure foundation for predictions that the market for power by 1940 will not only easily absorb but will positively require St. Lawrence power.

In 1921 the residential use of electricity was still predominantly for lighting, and the amount of power consumed by appliances was negligible. By 1932, however, domestic electric appliances were consuming over 57 percent of the electric power sold to residential customers.

It is important to note that in spite of the serious depression the number of electric refrigerators increased from 1,860,000 to 4,220,000 in 2 years. As the electric refrigerator consumes an average of 600 kilowatt-hours a year, this increase of 2,360,000 meant an expansion of 1,460,000,000 kilowatt-hours in the demand for electric power. Similarly the expansion of 220,000 in the number of electric ranges meant a market for an additional 605,000,000 kilowatt-hours, so that the increase in the number of these two appliances alone meant a new demand for over 2 billion kilowatt-hours of electrical energy.

Rural electrification will provide added market

An important phase of the expansion of the residential market for electricity will unquestionably be the extension of rural electrification, involving both the connection of a larger proportion of farms with central electric stations and use of electricity to perform more functions of the farm and rural home.

Recent years have witnessed a steady increase in the number of farms in the St. Lawrence power zone which receive electric service. The figures show that from 1923 to 1932 in the New England and Middle Atlantic States the number of farms receiving electric service has increased by nearly 250 percent. But this increase in rural electrification does not mean that the limits of the farm market are even being approached.

The possibility of increasing the number of rural families receiving electric service in New York State has been investigated by the New York Public Service Commission. The study showed that:

(1) At least 60,000 of the 100,000 farmers not yet receiving electrical service deserved consideration as potential electric customers, even though there should be no change in the technic of the electrical industry or in the status of rural electrification.

(2) The ready adoption by farmers of such appliances as electric milk coolers, milking machines, incubators, etc., indicates that the farm consumption of electricity is increasing rapidly and will continue to do so if properly encouraged.

(3) Some New York farmers were already finding it profitable to use from 1,000 to 1,500 kilowatt-hours per month.

(4) If electrical service were brought to the remaining economic farm units in the State, and if all farms were equipped with such appliances as they could economically use, the annual electric consumption by the farms of the State would amount to at least 300,000,000 kilowatt-hours, an increase of nearly a quarter of a billion kilowatt-hours in this field of electrical usage alone.

Electrical industry forecasts growing market for power

The electrical industry has set as a goal for domestic consumption 1,000 kilowatt-hours per customer in 1936, according to a recent statement by the commercial director of the Edison Electric Institute. To accomplish this the industry expects to supplement the growing use of electric refrigeration with an active development of electric cooking and electric water heating.

On the basis of figures showing the extent of saturation in the appliance market, Mr. C. M. Ripley, electrical engineer of the General Electric Co., estimated, February 3, 1932, that there was a potential market for appliances in the homes of the United States sufficient to increase domestic consumption of electricity by 48,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours.

The General Electric Co. has issued a number of documents on load building which describe in some detail the various new uses of electricity. One of these estimates that by the autumn of 1935 an additional 4,200,000 kilowatts of generating capacity will be required to meet the country's increased demand. It indicates the importance of anticipating the growth of load and of providing the necessary generating capacity to meet the requirements.

Another reflection of the electrical industry's anticipation of a growing market for electric power is to be found in a publication entitled "Load and Revenue Forecasting" authorized by the operating committee of the Edison Electric Institute in July 1933. Some of the conclusions as to future growth in demand for power may be quoted from this report, as follows:

"Energy consumption per customer will continue to increase, but at a somewhat faster rate, in all probability. This increase is very consistent through good times and bad, and admits of rather accurate forecast. The saturation point is not in sight, nor is it predictable. It has been pointed out that, at the present development of appliances, the possible consumption is 10,000 kilowatt-hours per customer (Electrical World, Jan. 7, 1933). Even this amount cannot be taken as the saturation point, because new applications of electricity in the home will raise this figure. * * *

"It is evident that there is an enormous expansion ahead of us. * * * It is evident that the domestic load will eventually assume enormous proportions in its demand on the distribution system."

These authoritative forecasts of the electrical industry itself, tending to support the conclusions derived from analysis of the trends in the production and consumption of electricity, present incontrovertible evidence that the market for St. Lawrence power will be ready before the project itself can be completed. Operating in accordance with the purpose laid down for it by the New York Legislature, its influence in the direction of lower domestic and rural rates will be a force tending to promote this expansion in the market for electricity.

Status of St. Lawrence power project under the laws of New York

The St. Lawrence power project of the State of New York is provided for in chapter 772 of the Laws of New York, approved by the Governor, April 27, 1931.

This act was the fruition of 25 years of effort to provide for development of St. Lawrence power by the State in the public interest. Licenses had been sought by private corporations for the right to exploit the power resources in the International Rapids section, but such applications were rejected by both State and Federal agencies.

Section 5 of the act specifically directed the power authority "to cooperate with the appropriate agencies and officials of the United States Government to the end that any project undertaken" by the trustee—

"shall be consistent with and in aid of the plans of the United States for the improvement of commerce and navigation along the St. Lawrence River, and shall be so planned and constructed as to be adaptable to the plans of the United States therefor, so that the necessary channels, locks, canals, and other navigational facilities may be constructed and installed by the United States in, through, and as part of the said project."

Section 5 directed the trustees to

"'develop, maintain, manage, and operate' the project and 'to make provision so that municipalities and other political subdivisions of the State * * * may secure a reasonable share of the power' 'subject to conditions which shall assure the resale of such power to domestic and rural consumers at the lowest possible price.'"

A formula was set up by this act to which any contracts made with private companies for transmission and distribution of current must conform. The act specifically provided for

(a) Full and complete disclosure to the power authority of all factors of cost in transmission and distribution of power, so that rates to consumers may be fixed initially in the contract and may be adjusted from time to time on the basis of true cost data.

(b) Periodic revisions of the service and rates to consumers on the basis of accurate cost data obtained by such accounting methods and systems as shall be approved by the trustees.

(c) That rates, services, and practices of the purchasing, transmitting, and distributing companies in respect to the power generated by this project shall be governed by the provisions and principles established in the contract, and not by the regulations of the Public Service Commission or by the general principles of public service law regulating rates, services, and practices.

Since the enactment of the law the trustees of the power authority have recommended additional legislation to permit municipalities which do not now enjoy that right under their charters to purchase St. Lawrence power for distribution to consumers.

In his message to the legislature, January 3, 1934, the Governor of New York made the following recommendation:

"I trust that during this session a definite conclusion will be reached by the Federal Government on the treaty with Canada for the development of the St. Lawrence River. The important thing is that power be developed as quickly as possible for the benefit of the consumers of electricity in this State.

"Pending the final settlement of this problem, I repeat the recommendation made to you last year, that you adopt legislation to permit municipalities of the State, after approval by a referendum vote, to purchase and sell electricity developed from the St. Lawrence River. Municipalities will in this way be able to buy cheap electricity, and at the same time be given a potent weapon with which to compel existing public-utility companies to provide them with electricity at reasonable rates."

The evident intent and effect of the laws of New York providing for the St. Lawrence power project has been the provision of a yardstick on electrical costs and rates for the benefit of the consumers of current and for the protection of the public against unfair charges.

The development of the St. Lawrence by a public agency represents the last opportunity available to provide the northeastern section of the United States with the benefits assured other sections through development of Muscle Shoals, Boulder Dam, the Columbia River, and similar public projects.

CONCLUSIONS

The studies independently made by the various agencies lead to the conclusion that the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence project for power and navigation should be undertaken without delay.

The navigation project is comparable in economic value and importance to the Panama Canal. It is combined with the development of the largest and cheapest block of hydroelectric power available in North America.

Undertaking of the project will provide employment on essential and self-liquidating public works during the immediate period of construction. Its completion will unquestionably confer important national benefits and stimulate the future growth and development of the United States.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JANUARY 11, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Our merciful Heavenly Father, there are no shore lines where Thou art. Even the wings of the morning are not mighty enough to carry us beyond Thy sheltering providence; somewhere and everywhere in all this old world is Thy mothering heart; we praise Thee. We beseech Thy wisdom and grace to help us to be spiritual architects, building upon those foundations that never give way. O let the temples of our immortal souls rise higher and higher and without the sound of a hammer. Do Thou manifest Thyself in all our works and keep us in touch with the teeming daily human life which is always unfolding itself before our open eyes. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RULE FOR CONSIDERATION OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules, the gentleman from North Carolina, I call up for consideration House Resolution 217 and ask that the same be reported.

House Resolution 217

Resolved, That during the consideration of H.R. 6663, a bill making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, all points of order against title II or any provisions contained therein are hereby waived; and no amendments or motions to strike out shall be in order to such title except amendments or motions to strike out offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, and said amendments or motions shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding. Amendments shall not be in order to any other section of the bill H.R. 6663 or to any section of any general appropriation bill of the Seventy-third Congress which would be in conflict with the provisions of title II of the bill H.R. 6663 as reported to the House, except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the rule. Under this reservation I wish to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, so we may know what the point of order is, I demand the regular order so that the point of order may be made. Then he can ask his question. We should like to know what the point of order is.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York to state his point of order.

Mr. SNELL. I ask the chairman of the committee if it is intended under the provisions of this rule, which is not drawn entirely in the usual manner, to take advantage under the peculiar wording of it to refuse to the minority the right to make the usual motion to recommit?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] will allow me to answer the gentleman's question, I may state this rule does not prevent a motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Does it prevent the usual motion to recommit?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know what the gentleman means by the usual motion.

Mr. SNELL. That is just the point I wish straightened out at this time. I mean the usual motion that is made to recommit a bill, where the minority have a right to put their position on pending legislation before the House for a vote, as is usually provided in and carried in every special rule that has ever been presented on the floor of the House, in language of the following import: "Except one motion to recommit."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I may state to the gentleman from New York that this rule, as the gentleman will understand by reading it—and we may as well be candid about it in the very beginning——

Mr. SNELL. We may as well be in the beginning of this discussion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think it is always best. I may state to the gentleman that the rule as provided in this resolution does not prevent a motion to recommit the bill to the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean we cannot make the usual motion to recommit, which states the position of the minority in regard to the legislation?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman desires a categorical answer to his question, I may say that, in conformity with the spirit and purpose of this rule, to protect the attitude of the Committee on Appropriations and what I believe is the attitude of the administration on this question, a simple motion to recommit to the committee would be in order under this rule.

Mr. SNELL. And nothing except the motion to recommit?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me state it again, so there will be no doubt about it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the rule that it is not a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, on the ground that it violates the general rules of the House by denying the right to the minority to make the usual and regular motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as far as I am familiar with the rights of the Committee on Rules to make privileged reports, they are entitled to report a rule at any time, with the two exceptions, and these exceptions are specifically set forth in section 725, page 327, of the Manual:

The Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order which shall provide that business under paragraph 7 of rule XXIV—shall be set aside by a vote of less than two thirds of the Members present—

Which is the Calendar Wednesday rule—

The next exception covers the point I am making in my point of order—

nor shall it report any rule or order which shall operate to prevent the motion to recommit being made as provided in paragraph 4 of rule XVI.

Paragraph 4 of rule XVI states the following:

After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution, one motion to recommit shall be in order.

Also rule XVII, section 1, provides—

It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain a motion to commit with or without instructions to a standing or select committee.

It has been the precedent of the House for a great many years that under no circumstances will the minority be prohibited from making a motion to recommit, and I have yet never heard anyone express a different opinion on policy or philosophy of the rules of the House. In this way the minority is allowed to place its position before the Congress, and, if enough Members approve of it, they are entitled to a roll-call vote. I have never heard anyone take a different position on the floor of the House. But it is evident, from what the gentleman from Alabama says, that they intend, by the particular wording of this rule, to take advantage of the situation and to deny the minority the right of making such a motion. For this reason I maintain the rule is subject to the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The motion to recommit does not permit anything in it that is not in order under a bill.

Mr. SNELL. I did not say that it did.

Mr. BLANTON. This rule merely shows what is in order under this bill. A motion to recommit to the committee can well be made.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman does not understand at all the point I was arguing.

Mr. BLANTON. This is the crux of the whole thing. This is the same kind of a rule we had under the Johnson legislation.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman never saw a rule like this during his membership in this House.

Mr. BLANTON. We had a rule to suspend all rules under that Johnson veterans' legislation on June 26, 1930.

Mr. SNELL. I do not remember what he makes reference to, but I know we have never passed a rule that denies the right to the minority to make the usual motion to recommit.

Mr. BLANTON. A rule which was so tight you could not change the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t."

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman still does not understand the point of my argument at all.

Mr. BLANTON. There is no point to it.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I am afraid the gentleman is confused, and honestly so. This is not a rule for the reporting of a bill which would carry the usual provision that there should be the right of a motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. Yes. Stop right there for a moment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is a rule pertaining to a matter in a bill. The bill comes before the House by privilege, coming from the Committee on Appropriations. Therefore no rule is needed in order that the bill may be considered. This rule is directed to points of order against a certain provision in the bill. Now, the gentleman said that under the rules all rules from the Committee on Rules should contain a provision permitting a motion to recommit.

Mr. SNELL. I do not think that is absolutely necessary, although it is generally carried. We will not argue that point.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Rule XI itself gives the right to recommit whether or not anything is said in the special rule itself.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; but the gentleman from Alabama said frankly that he expected to limit the motion to recommit the bill to the Appropriations Committee to a motion to recommit without any instructions whatever. This is definitely against the rules of the House and the whole philosophy and precedents on which the rules are founded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman concluded his statement?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; I have concluded my statement for the present.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to what the gentleman from New York said, the matter now pending before the Speaker for decision is on a point of order reserved by the gentleman from New York, to wit, that the rule reported and now pending violates the standing rules of the House with reference to a motion to recommit a bill. There is nothing in this rule, as I stated to the gentleman before, that would deny to any Member a motion to recommit the bill. There is nothing in this rule that would prevent any Member from offering a motion to recommit on any other phase of the bill except that covered by title II.

As I stated to the gentleman, we might as well put all the cards on the table now as hereafter, because this will come up if the rule is adopted as a matter of parliamentary construction.

Mr. SNELL. That is the reason I brought the matter up at this time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There is no reason for equivocation about that. The purpose of this rule, if we have the votes to adopt it, is to protect, as I stated to the gentleman, the integrity of title II of the pending bill in toto. Under this rule, if adopted, a motion could be made to recommit to the Appropriations Committee. A motion could be made, and would be in order, to recommit with instructions as to any other item or items in the bill not covered by title II. But it is my opinion, and I think the Chair would so hold, that a motion to recommit with instructions affecting matters under title II would not be in order.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. As I understand it, there are a number of gentlemen on both sides of the aisle who would like to vote for a return to the old-salary basis. The gentleman has repeatedly referred to title II without qualifying his remarks. I am asking the gentleman for information at this time. Many of the Members on the floor of the House do not know what title II encompasses. It may cover many things in many different directions. Is not the rule intended to deliberately prevent a vote on the question of returning to the old-salary basis that we had before March 4 of last year?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman may vote against the bill if he so desires.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; but then a motion cannot be made to recommit, with instructions to the committee to bring back another bill based upon old salaries.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I stated that to the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. But the gentleman did not state it clearly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I stated it very clearly. I believe the gentleman from New York understood it. I am not responsible for the understanding of the gentleman from Illinois in all cases.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for a decision.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For what purpose?

Mr. KVALE. For the purpose of asking a question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. The rule applies also to all other appropriation bills that are to be brought in at this session, does it not?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It applies to all other appropriation bills that may be brought in at this session if there is an attempt made to affect the provisions covered by title II of this bill. In other words, allow me to state to the gentleman from Minnesota the naked fact with reference to it. These are the views of the majority leadership in this House, and I am not putting myself in that category because I am a mere private in the ranks, and of the President of the United States, as I understand it, and I think this will be explained to the House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The purpose of this whole controversy here today is to have the House deliberately determine for today and hereafter during the remainder of this session whether or not they are going to follow the President's recommendations or not. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. That is the point, whether they are with him or against him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The purpose of this rule is to get the sentiment of the House as it affects the economy bill, or whether they are going to pursue some other policy and the gentleman is right in the construction of the rule, as indicated by the query he has submitted.

Mr. SNELL. I am not going to take any exception to the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama except to this one effect. I have no objection to the Democrats in this House following the President of the United States, but we have a right to demand that they follow him according to the prescribed rules of the House of Representatives of the United States. [Applause.] I know that the interpretation they are putting on this rule is contrary to the spirit of the rules of this House and to every precedent of the House in the last 20 years.

I have not been able in the short time I have had to find many decisions, but I want to call the Speaker's attention to a decision by Speaker Gillett, found at the bottom of page 328 of the Manual, which reads as follows:

> The Committee on Rules cannot report a rule which is aimed strictly or directly at overthrowing Calendar Wednesday or the motion to recommit.

There is another decision by Speaker Cannon and one by Speaker Clark.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Read the balance of the sentence.

Mr. SNELL. That is not in point here.

There is also a decision by Speaker Clark along the same line, which I will put in later, because I cannot turn to them at the present time; but I want the Speaker to understand that I am making the point of order that the provisions of this rule are not in conformity with the philosophy of the rules of the House, do not carry out intent and purpose of the rules, and are directly opposed to the precedents, the decisions, and practices of this House.

RULINGS BY SPEAKERS CLARK AND CANNON

Where a special order provided for the appointment of conferees "without any intervening motion", it was held to exclude the motion to instruct conferees, but not the motion to recommit

On August 15, 1912 (62d Cong., 2d sess., CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11042) the House agreed to a resolution making it in order to take the post office appropriation bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. It was further provided that on the adoption of the resolution the Speaker should appoint conferees "without any intervening motion."

Mr. Mann moved to commit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads with instructions to that committee to report it back forthwith with the recommendation that Senate amendment no. 118 be agreed to.

Mr. John A. Moon, of Tennessee, made the point of order that the special order by which the bill was taken from the Speaker's table prevented the submission of intervening motions, including the motion to recommit, and demanded the previous question.

The Speaker read the last sentence of section 1, rule XVII, and decided (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 11089) that the special order could not abrogate this provision, and recognized Mr. Mann to offer the motion to recommit. (Cannon's Precedents, vol. 6, sec. 7950.)

A special order to lay before the House a bill on the Speaker's table with the previous question ordered on a motion to concur in Senate amendments, does not prevent submission of a motion to recommit.

On March 4, 1911 (61st Cong., 3d sess., CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4332), Mr. John Dalzell, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That when the bill (H.R. 32010), 'An act to create a tariff board,' shall have been received from the Senate the Speaker shall immediately, without regard to pending business, lay it before the House, and thereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered on a motion to concur in the Senate amendments in gross."

Mr. Fitzgerald moved to commit the Senate amendments to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, raised a question of order and contended that the special order just adopted precluded the motion commit.

The Speaker overruled the point of order. (Cannon's Precedents, vol. 6, sec. 7892.)

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. O'CONNOR. If the Chair will permit, I desire to be heard for just a moment to point out that the gentleman from New York, the minority leader, read only a portion of the decision by Speaker Gillett.

Mr. SNELL. The other part did not have reference to this question.

Mr. O'CONNOR. This is what the minority leader read:

The Committee on Rules cannot report a rule which is aimed strictly or directly at overthrowing Calendar Wednesday or the motion to recommit,—

The gentleman from New York stopped at the comma there and did not read the rest of the sentence in that decision, which I now want to call to the attention of the Speaker:

but this does not prevent the Committee from reporting a resolution couched in general terms which may directly ban that ultimate result, such as a resolution providing for 6 days' suspension of the rules.

[Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. That has no reference to the question. Wait a minute, and do not holla too soon, and do not give the rebel yell, for it is bad precedent in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BLANTON. It is a darned good yell.

Mr. SNELL. It probably was 75 years ago, but it is not today, and it is poor form to raise it here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, do I still have the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama has been recognized.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield to me so that I may answer the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will not interject any outside remarks.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will control the Members on his side I will endeavor to do so on my own side, but we are not going to allow the rebel yell and not reply.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I submit that the gentleman from Alabama does not have the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman from New York and not to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Alabama does not have the floor on a point of order, and the gentleman from New York has the floor by recognition of the Chair on the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. I simply want to say in reply to what the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has said that the reference he read referred to rules suspending the rules during the last few days of the regular session, and the point I make is that it is not in order to bring in a rule which directly or indirectly keeps the minority from offering the usual motion to recommit.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, may I say just a word on the point of order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MAPES. I have as much respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Alabama on points of order and interpretations of the rules of the House as any other Member of the House, but I should like to submit to the Speaker that the gentleman's interpretation of this rule is not necessarily binding upon the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows that. That is not a point of order.

The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. MAPES. If the Chair is ready to rule——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not need such instructions.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I was only saying that preliminary to what I intended to say about the rule, and I thought it was pertinent.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. MAPES. I thought it was pertinent to what I was going to say about the rule, but if the Speaker does not care to hear me, that is all right.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker will be pleased to hear the gentleman discuss the point of order.

Mr. MAPES. I was about to say I did not feel that the interpretation of the gentleman from Alabama of this rule was either correct or binding upon the Speaker; but if the Speaker accepts the interpretation of the rule as given by the gentleman from Alabama as being correct, it seems to me that he must sustain the point of order as raised by the gentleman from New York; but, for myself, I do not agree with that interpretation.

The rules of the House of Representatives are very specific and definite about motions to recommit, and I submit to the Speaker that it is dangerous to hold that a rule like this, which makes no reference to the motion to recommit, repeals or does away with the rule giving the minority the right to make one motion to recommit.

Nothing is said in this rule about a motion to recommit. It says only that no amendment to title II of the bill can be made except upon motion made by the Committee on Appropriations, and it is reading more into this rule than the language itself contains for the Speaker or for the gentleman from Alabama to say that it prevents the usual motion to recommit. The rules of the House are so sensitive in sustaining the right to make a motion to recommit in the regular way that it seems to me the Chair would not be justified in holding that a rule of this kind repeals or nullifies the standing rule with respect to the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that the Committee on Rules has reported out a resolution which violates the provisions of clause 45, rule XI, which are as follows:

The Committee on Rules shall not report any rule or order * * * which shall operate to prevent the motion to recommit being made as provided in clause 4, rule XVI.

The pertinent language of clause 4, rule XVI is as follows:

After the previous question shall have been ordered on the passage of a bill or joint resolution one motion to recommit shall be in order and the Speaker shall give preference in recognition for such purpose to a Member who is opposed to the bill or resolution.

The special rule, House Resolution 217, now before the House, does not mention the motion to recommit. Therefore, any motion to recommit would be made under the general rules of the House. The contention of the gentleman from New York that this special rule deprives the minority of the right to make a motion to recommit is, therefore, obviously not well taken. The right to offer a motion to recommit is provided for in the general rules of the House, and since no mention is made in the special rule now before the House it naturally follows that the motion would be in order.

A question may present itself later when a motion to recommit with instructions is made on the bill H.R. 6663 that the special rule which is now before the House may prevent a motion to recommit with instructions which would be in conflict with the provisions of the special rule. It has been held on numerous occasions that a motion to recommit with instructions may not propose as instructions anything that might not be proposed directly as an amendment. Of course, inasmuch as the special rule prohibits amendments to title II of the bill H.R. 6663 it would not be in order after the adoption of the special rule to move to recommit the bill with instructions to incorporate an amendment in title II of the bill. The Chair, therefore, holds that the motion to recommit, as provided in clause 4, rule XVI, has been reserved to the minority and that insofar as such rule is concerned the special rule before the House does not deprive the minority of the right to make a simple motion to recommit. The Chair thinks, however, that a motion to recommit with instructions to incorporate a provision which would be in violation of the special rule, House Resolution 217, would not be in order. For the reasons stated, the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Will the Chair allow me to make a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand from the ruling of the Chair the minority will be allowed to offer the usual motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The usual simple motion to recommit provided by the rules.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as much as I dislike to do it, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. SNELL. And on that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 260, nays 112, answered "present" 4, not voting 54, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 6131. An act to raise revenue by taxing certain intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes.

RULE FOR CONSIDERATION OF INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1935

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] while I make a request for unanimous consent. The usual limit for the discussion of a resolution from the Committee on Rules is 1 hour; but, in view of the fact that it is probable that the main issues involved in this controversy could legitimately be discussed in the consideration of the rule, we have had a tacit agreement with the minority members of the committee that debate may extend for 3 hours, to be confined to the resolution. In view of that agreement, I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that the time for the discussion of the resolution now pending be confined to 3 hours, one half of which shall be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] and one half by myself, and that at the conclusion of the 3 hours the previous question on the resolution shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. RANSLEY. Debate to be confined to the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate upon the resolution be confined to 3 hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] and one half by himself, at the conclusion of which time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—I ask whether those on the Democratic side who may not be in favor of the rule will be given some time from the control on the Democratic side?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say very candidly to the gentleman that I have requests for more time than I can dispose of now from those who are in favor of the resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY. In other words, we will have to go to the other side to get a chance to record our opinion of the rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the circumstances I regret to say that I think that will be necessary.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Do I understand that no one who is opposed to this rule has asked the gentleman from Alabama for time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did have requests from two or three Members on this side who asked for time in the discussion of the rule. Those on this side generally are in the affirmative for the passage of this rule.

Mr. CONNERY. But the gentleman had requests from no one who is against it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Those on the other side control the time on that side, for those who are opposed to the rule. There are several members of the Committee on Rules who ordinarily are entitled to the privilege of speaking, and in view of the peculiar nature of this question most of the time in the discussion of this rule will be allotted to the members of the Committee on Appropriations. I say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] that that conclusion has not been reached as a matter of discourtesy or as a penalty to any Members on this side of the aisle who may be opposed to the rule, but I think it is consistent probably with the situation which confronts us.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Those of us on this side of the House are perfectly agreeable to the division of the time of an hour and a half on a side, but on the matter of the previous question being considered as ordered there cannot be an agreement so far as that is concerned.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. SNELL. I suggest to the gentleman from Alabama that he modify his request and put it without the previous question. The gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to the previous question portion of the request, although he does make the request that debate shall be confined to the bill as well as the rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania well knows and as the gentleman from New York well knows, of course we would have only 1 hour for the discussion of this rule.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, but as the gentleman from Alabama says, this is the crux of the whole matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We wanted to accommodate the opposition by some liberality of debate.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BRITTEN. Does that mean that debate will be limited to the bill as well as the rule?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It will be limited to the resolution, and, of course, that would permit discussion of the merits of the bill itself. Does the gentleman object to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. RANSLEY. I object to the previous-question portion of it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That means that the gentleman objects to the request.

Mr. RANSLEY. Then I shall have to object to that.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I modify the request, and ask unanimous consent that the debate on the resolution be confined to 3 hours, one half of which shall be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and one half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that debate extend for 3 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY]. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The original request was that the debate shall be confined to the bill or the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Debate to be confined to the bill or the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I asked for 3 minutes to discuss this rule, and I was not given that privilege. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that the gentleman from Georgia objects. Of course I have no control over his conclusions at all, but I ask the gentleman to consider the situation, that by making his objection he is cutting off 2 hours of general debate upon the merits of the resolution.

Mr. O'MALLEY. What particular advantage is it to discuss it for 2 hours more?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], Chairman of the Committee on Rules.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be permitted to make a very brief statement without interruption. On March 4, 1933, the President of the United States took the oath of office. When the President of the United States took that oath of office at that time, he found the country had descended to the lowest point, economically speaking, in all its history. He immediately set to work to present to the country a program which he hoped would have beneficial results. During the last session of Congress, time and again, we passed through this House resolutions from the Committee on Rules, which had for their purpose the putting through of his program.

This rule which the House is now being called upon to consider cuts off all amendments from title II of the bill, waives all points of order, and for its effect requires of the House either a vote up or down of the entire title II. Title II is a part of the program of the President of the United States. It has often been designated as the heart of his program. Speaking for myself, I shall not undertake to fire a shot at the program of my own President by even offering to amend title II.

The Committee on Appropriations is asking for this resolution. It is the hope of the administration, so I am informed, that the House will sustain the request of the Committee on Appropriations. We might as well face the issue here and now. Franklin Roosevelt's program has already produced vast results throughout the Nation. A blind man can see that there has been a tremendous improvement since March 4.

So far as I am concerned, I have no apology to make for supporting this rule. It is a simple test, as to whether or not we are going to hold up the hands of our great President. He is asking that his program, which was partially put in effect during the special session of Congress, be continued by virtue of the action of the House on this resolution.

I have supported the program of a number of Presidents, if you will pardon a concluding personal word. I supported Theodore Roosevelt in his naval program; I supported Woodrow Wilson, the great. I am winding up 33 years, gentlemen, a good long time. My brethren of the House of Representatives, I say to you here and now, that never during those 33 years have I supported any policy of any man with as much enthusiasm and as much satisfaction as I now support that of Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the Republican leader, Mr. SNELL.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no controversy with the statement made by my distinguished friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU]. I understood that the majority would support the President, but my contention has been so far here today—and I want to reiterate it—that I demand you support the President in accordance with the rules and precedents of the House of Representatives. [Applause.] You have evidently decided not to follow those rules or precedents, as a result of sustaining the decision handed down by the distinguished Speaker of this House, which, although I dislike to say it, is the most unfair, the most ruthless decision that has been handed down since I have been a Member of this Congress, and that has been 20 years.

On the morning of December 21 I was very pleased to read in the Washington Post, in large headlines, the following:

BYRNS OPENS MOVE TO JUNK HOUSE GAG—DEMOCRATS ENLIST G.O.P. AID TO END TACTICS OF LAST SESSION

House Democratic leaders are planning to junk unprecedented gag-rule procedure employed to rush the President's emergency program through the last session of Congress.

Relying on scattered Republican pledges of "cooperation" and a safe Democratic majority, House Democratic strategists hope to abandon "legislation by rule" at the January term, discarding the great body of gag precedents built up last spring.

In large headlines the following:

WILL NOT NEED RULE

"In the first place, I don't think we will need the special rules we were forced to bring out last session", Representative JOSEPH W. BYRNS (Democrat), of Tennessee, said last night.

"In the second place—

I want you people on the majority side to get this—

"I don't approve of the principle and never did."

[Applause.]

I was still further pleased to read in the Washington Post on the morning of December 26, 1933, the following:

HOUSE LEADER PLANS SUPPLY BILL REFORM—BUCHANAN HITS PRACTICE OF TACKING LAWS ON APPROPRIATIONS—DEMOCRATS EXPECT MORE SPEEDY ACTION WITH SIMPLER PROCEDURE

Reforms in House procedure on the 11 big appropriation bills, limiting the supply measures more strictly to the original purpose of providing funds for the operations of the Government, will be sought this session by House Democratic leaders.

Representative JAMES P. BUCHANAN (Democrat) Texas, Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, told the Post last night he hopes to eliminate the previous practice of writing general legislation into appropriation bills to expedite the passage through both Houses.

"Only where the White House specifically asks that legislation be handled in this manner will we use the supply bills for legislative purposes", Chairman BUCHANAN said.

"Appropriation bills should be regarded altogether as supply measures. In recent years we have been using them too broadly for legislation. I intend to stop the practice if I can."

That is the statement that the Democratic leaders of this House gave to the country at large 2 weeks before the session met.

When I read that statement in the paper, I made up my mind that I was about in the same position as a poor half-breed, pack-basket lumberjack man up in my country in the spring of the year. The man that I especially have in mind was Napoleon Lavine. They always called him "Old Pete." One day I met Old Pete in the road after he had been down to settle up for his winter work. I said to Pete, "Well, Pete, how did you get along?" He said, "Mr. SNELL, I tell you the truth. When I go down and go into that store, Billy Hartman's store, what you think? Billy Hartman was right behind the door. He say to me, 'Good morning, Napoleon.'" He said, "I know damn well when he call me Napoleon he going to skin me." [Laughter.]

I knew mighty well when I saw the statement of the majority leaders of how generous and how liberal and fair they were going to be in considering legislation this session they were getting ready to skin me, and they have started by the first bill that has been presented to the House.

Now, I have never been opposed to special rules, on certain occasions they are justifiable and I have probably brought more of them into this House than any present Member, but I have always considered there was a responsibility on the Rules Committee to be fairly fair with the House; just fairly fair. [Laughter.]

I say without hesitation, and I do not think any man on the majority side will deny the statement, that this is the most vicious, the most far-reaching special rule that has ever been brought on the floor of the American Congress. [Applause]. I admit that is a pretty broad statement.

If any man can show me where any majority ever dared bring in a rule to the House that not only hog-tied and prohibited the Members from expressing themselves on the legislation in hand but even extended through the entire session of Congress and all future appropriation bills for the entire Congress, I want him to tell me when it was done. Of course, I know why you are doing it. You think it is easier to hog-tie your own men today than it will be after we have been in session for 5 months. [Applause.] We tripped you up a couple of times the latter end of the last session because your own men were getting ashamed of you. You were ashamed of it yourselves. If you had not been, your leaders would never have given those interviews to the papers.

Another thing absolutely sure is that the majority leaders of the House either have no faith in the merits of the legislation presented today or have no confidence in the intelligence, the integrity, or the ability of their own Members to pass this legislation on its real merits. [Applause.]

Notwithstanding the statement of the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, this present bill carries more legislation than any average appropriation bill, and it is very vital, important legislation; it is legislation that affects the jurisdiction of a great many of the committees of this House. If we are going to start this way, what on earth is the use of forming committees? Why not simply say, "The Appropriations Committee and the President are going to do it all and we are going to abdicate absolutely all our rights as representatives of the people"? Are you real representatives of the people or just automatons?

One of the items in this bill about which I wish to talk is the authority given to heads of departments to create deficiencies. Ever since I have been here the policy of this Government has been decidedly and almost unanimously against the granting of any such authority; and I remember very well when the present majority leader was Chairman of the great Appropriations Committee—and he was a good chairman—he fairly raised the roof of this House talking about deficits on the part of executive departments, saying that never as long as he was in a position of authority would he agree to any such thing.

Why has he changed his position on the proposition at the present time?

There are two provisions in this bill whereby promotions are granted to the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps personnel, but denied to several other branches of the service.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman is mistaken about that. We have raised them to an equal basis with the employees of the civil departments of the Government.

Mr. SNELL. Why did you not do it with all the rest of the departments?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We did.

Mr. SNELL. I do not so understand.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Read the bill again.

Mr. SNELL. It is impossible to tell what you intend to do because it is all covered up, and you will not tell us exactly what is intended by any of this language.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Doubtless the gentleman has not read the report of the committee, for it is very full on this question.

Mr. SNELL. It so happens the gentleman has read the report of the committee.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Read it again.

Mr. SNELL. Another very important matter is the pay of the civil-service employees. I was one of the Members of this House who last spring voted for the present economy measure. I did it with the understanding that it was going to be the policy of this administration to balance the Budget and cut down expenditures so they would somewhere near equal the income of the Government. Referring to the argument in favor of the Economy Act at that time, I find that the President said in his message, taking particular pains to point it out, that during the previous 3 years of Republican rule there had been a deficit of $4,134,000,000. He affirmed that this continued deficit running over a period of 3 years had contributed to the collapse of our banking system, accentuated the stagnation of the economic life, and had added to the ranks of the unemployed. He went on further to warn Congress that upon the unimpaired credit of the United States Government rested the safety of bank deposits, the security of insurance policies and the activity of industrial enterprises, the value of agricultural products, and the availability of employment. Continuing, he said:

> I give you assurance that if this is done, there is reasonable prospect that within a year the income of the Government will be sufficient to cover the expenditures.

On that basis, on that policy, a great many Members voted for the Economy Act. But within 60 days after the President received that authority and made that statement, the present administration commenced to spend the money in a more profligate manner than any administration in the history of this Government. [Applause.] But, in addition to that, the President comes before Congress 10 months after he made his first statement and frankly says that he expects that at the end of the first fiscal year of his administration there will be a deficit of $7,309,000,000.

Now, in the face of this attitude, in the face of the absolute recklessness with which we are shoveling money out of the Treasury, what reason is there to further take the $5 or the $10 a month from the civil-service employees, the old widows, or the service-connected disability cases of the World War or Spanish War veterans? [Applause.]

I for one am willing to meet each one of these issues on its merits. If you gentlemen are as liberal as you claim to be, you will give us the opportunity of meeting these issues on their merits, and you will vote down the previous question on this rule and give this House the right to consider this legislation on its merits and the way it ought to be considered. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I brought all these documents and data here in the expectation there would be 3 hours of debate on this rule. Since there is to be but an hour of debate and my time is confined to 10 minutes, I shall touch some high spots only.

First I shall ask the Clerk to read this letter from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington.

MY DEAR MR. BUCHANAN: In my message transmitting to Congress the Budget for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, recommendation was made for the continuance during that fiscal year of certain economy legislative provisions. With regard to the continuance of the provision prohibiting automatic increases in compensation, recommendation was made that the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps be excepted from the restrictions thereof, commencing with July 1, 1934.

Upon further consideration of this matter I feel that if the six services mentioned in the Pay Adjustment Act of 1922 are given privileges of promotion comparable to those conferred upon civilian employees it will place the entire Federal service on a more uniform basis. Existing law permits of the advancement of a civilian employee of a lower grade to fill a vacancy in a higher grade, with an increase of compensation if his rate of pay is less than the minimum provided for the higher grade.

If the same principle be applied to the six services mentioned in the Pay Adjustment Act of 1922, I believe that such action would place all services on a more comparable basis and remove many of the inequalities.

I hope the Congress will enact the legislative economy provisions referred to in my Budget message as changed by the recommendation contained in this letter.

Sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN,
Chairman Appropriations Committee,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Clerk be allowed to read another letter from the President which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, January 9, 1934.

MY DEAR MR. BUCHANAN: I am today signing an Executive order, which, in effect, maintains the 15-percent reduction in the compensation of officers and employees of the Government until June 30, 1934.

I have taken this action only after an exceedingly careful check up by the Department of Labor in relation to the cost of living during the past 6 months. As you know, the act of March 20, 1933, authorizes me to restore a portion of the 15-percent reduction only if the index figures rise to above 15 percent below the cost of living index for the base period.

I have had two careful examinations made. The first of these relates to the general cost of living and shows that it is still 21.1 percent below the index for the base period in the country as a whole. The other set of findings concerns the cost of living of Government employees in the District of Columbia. In this case the cost of living is 14.6 percent below the index for the base period.

May I call your attention to the fact that all of these figures are based on data obtained by Government employees themselves, and that every effort has been made to arrive at the truth. I know, also, that you will realize that the overwhelming majority of Federal employees are scattered throughout the United States. In a few cities it is undoubtedly true that the present cost of living is slightly higher than the 15-percent reduction of pay warrants. It is necessary, nevertheless, under the law, to take the average, as there is no provision for picking out special localities for differences in rates.

The action taken by me today will, I know, be of interest to your committee in connection with the appropriation bills. I have recommended a flat restoration of 5 percent, or one third of the 15-percent reduction, this restoration to apply to the next fiscal year. I have asked also for authority to restore such portion of the balance of 10 percent as may be warranted by a possible further increase in the cost of living. I hope that your committee will go along with these suggestions. The problem of returning as quickly as possible to a balanced Budget is involved. To undo the excellent results of the Economy Act of last spring would be unfortunate for the very simple reason that we are very definitely still in an emergency period, in which all of us are seeking to bring back recovery as quickly as possible.

I shall, of course, be glad to talk with you and the members of your committee at any time.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Hon. JAMES P. BUCHANAN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield a moment for me to submit a request?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request in reference to extension of debate on this matter. I do not know that it will do any good. However, I feel sure there are a great many Members here who would like to see this matter fully discussed. I therefore renew my request that the time for debate on the rule be extended to 3 hours, one half of the time to be controlled by myself and one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that time for debate on the rule be extended to 3 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY]. Is there objection?

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, immediately after the House convened today I asked the gentleman from Alabama if he would allot me 3 minutes of the 3 hours' time set apart for a discussion of this special rule in order that I might explain my position with reference to it. I stated at the time that if the Democratic Members of the House had had a caucus and if I had been given the opportunity to recuse myself on account of certain pledges I have made to my constituents, I would not need to explain my vote, but that it was going to be necessary for me to make some kind of an explanation as to why I purpose to vote against this rule today. I consider now that I have had the opportunity of explaining my vote, and I certainly do not wish to limit the debate.

Mr. RANSLEY. If the gentleman will yield, I shall be glad to give him time. I will yield him 3 minutes.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I am not required to go to the other side of the aisle and ask for time. I say now that the reason I am going to vote against this rule is because I have made some definite pledges to my constituents, especially to the American Legion, Spanish-American War veterans and their widows, and to certain postal employees. I cannot vote for this rule without indirectly, at least, violating these pledges. For these reasons I objected to the gentleman's unanimous-consent request. Since I have been given the privilege of making this statement, I now withdraw my objection.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Reserving the right to object, I should like to know from the gentleman in charge of the time if it would be possible to obtain 3 minutes from the Democratic side instead of being forced to go to the Republican side and ask for time to speak against this rule?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am always willing to bargain a little.

Mr. O'MALLEY. That is why I am making the request.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will trade with the gentleman.

Mr. CONNERY. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will state to the gentleman that I make only one trade a day.

Mr. CONNERY. I should like to say to the gentleman from Alabama that I am not trying to make a trade. I merely want to say that I have time from the Republican side—and I do not care what side it comes from when it is time to fight for the veterans and Government employees.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I now yield to the gentleman from Texas 30 minutes, or so much thereof as the gentleman desires to use.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. There seems to be some misapprehension on the part of certain Members of the House as to the effect of this rule and this legislation on veterans' bills that we hope to pass at this session of Congress. I want to ask the gentleman from Texas whether or not this rule would have any effect whatever on legislation reported out from the Veterans' Committee and passed on subsequently in the House?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It will have no effect on any bill voted out by the Veterans' Committee. Neither will it have any effect on any amendment to this appropriation bill or any other appropriation bill that comes before this House on World War or Spanish-American War pensions. In other words, there is nothing in the rule and there is nothing in this legislation that will make out of order any amendment to increase the compensation of World War or Spanish-American War veterans in this bill or any other appropriation bill, if the amendment be otherwise in order under the general rules.

Mr. RANKIN. If a veterans' bill should be reported out by the Veterans' Committee at this session of Congress, then, as I understand it, the appropriation for it could be taken care of in a deficiency bill later on?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Absolutely.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Do I understand the gentleman from Texas to be of the opinion and state that if this rule should be adopted, and I, as a friend of the veterans and Federal employees, should offer an amendment to the legislative provisions of the bill, said amendment, if it provided an increase in pay or compensation would be in order without a rule from the committee?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The legislative provision of the bill does not relate in any respect to the compensation of World War or Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. MAY. Does it apply to civilian employees of the Federal Government?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It applies to Federal employees of the Government, but as employees and not as war veterans.

Mr. GOSS. If the rule is adopted, it will mean a 10-percent cut to the widows of Civil War veterans, will it not?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The current law provides for a 10-percent cut during the present year. This legislation carries forward the 10 percent into next year, with a modifying provision that if the cost of living goes up, as found by the survey made by direction of the President, the 10 percent is to be further reduced.

Mr. GOSS. But, otherwise, that would go off automatically June 30 next.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; it would go off automatically June 30 next, as would all these other economy provisions that are proposed to be renewed in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, let me now discuss for a short while the attitude of the administration toward this amendment.

My distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the Republican leader, read an interview that I had with the Washington Post. The interview is reported correctly. I do not favor legislation on appropriation bills, and I am doing my best to keep such legislation out of appropriation bills; but, as the interview shows, I said in that interview, and I state now and here, that I make one exception to that rule. When legislation on an appropriation bill is requested by the President of the United States to carry out the great program for the relief of our country and when the President, whom the people have elected to bring such relief to the country, whom they have trusted, and whom we have trusted and whom we are going to continue to trust, requests that legislation be placed on an appropriation bill so that he may take no chance on his recovery program not being carried forward, I am going to do my best to put it on there, and I have no apology to make to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] or anybody else. [Applause.]

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman is willing to agree to the things that the President submits, and I have no doubt but what those things may be right, why does not the gentleman want to place some confidence in his own colleagues, and give them an opportunity to use their judgment in matters of this kind?

Mr. BUCHANAN. What confidence we place in our colleagues is none of the gentleman's concern. That is our business; and I may say that we have absolute confidence in our colleagues, and so far as the majority party of this House is concerned, the Democrats will take care of themselves and their own conferences without interference from the Republican side.

Mr. RICH. If the gentleman will yield further, I am not talking politically; I am only talking for the good of the country in order that the Members of the House may have an opportunity to express themselves; and we might support the President's legislation.

Mr. BUCHANAN. To my Democratic colleagues let me say that the President requested this legislation in his Budget sent in here on January 4 last. We did not immediately accept that, because some Members thought that was written in there by the Director of the Budget and that the attention of the President might not have been called specifically to it. So your Speaker [Mr. RAINEY], your leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON], and myself at a conference at the White House discussed this identical subject. We discussed it fully, the President reviewed it and requested that it be placed on an appropriation bill and also requested that a rule be sought for its consideration.

Mr. MAY. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I should like to get myself clear on one mattter, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. All right; I yield.

Mr. MAY. Does this bill provide, in accordance with the President's request, as contained in his letters, that 5 percent of the 15 percent will be restored under the bill as of June 30 next?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It does.

Mr. MAY. And the other is a matter of future determination.

Mr. BUCHANAN. According to the cost of living; yes.

So even the request for a rule comes directly from the man who occupies the White House, who has the greatest combination of heart and mind of any President who ever graced that great office. [Applause.]

I am an administration man. I have absolute confidence in the success of this administration. I feel sure the President has the problems well in hand and is taking all reasonable steps and taking them intelligently in order to bring relief to our country.

Now, this is not new legislation. It is the continuance of legislation in effect during this present fiscal year through enactments of the last session of Congress. The President's entire Budget estimates are based upon a continuance of these legislative provisions during the next fiscal year. If they should be upset, then the whole Budget will be upset, and this Congress would have to increase the Budget $170,000,000 over and above the Budget estimates.

Not only this, but if this program is defeated, it is a step backward by Congress in effecting economy and in bringing relief to the country. How do you know what effect it would have if it should go out to the country that Congress is not backing up the President and that Congress is repudiating the economy program which it adopted at the former session of Congress and was making vast appropriations which the President had not recommended. Why, the psychological effect upon the country of such a course on our part might even interfere with the refinancing program that the President must accomplish if our country is to recover. The economy legislation contained in this bill is one of the cornerstones and one of the foundations upon which this entire recovery program is based and the President, in substance, so stated to us. Then they talk about defeating it.

Now, let us see what this measure does. There are 15 different classifications of savings affected by this economy legislation.

First, the general salary reduction of 10 percent, and not 15 percent as we provided this year. This causes an additional appropriation of $63,000,000 which has been added to the Budget to take care of the restoration of the 5 percent.

That will save, if the cost of living does not rise, $128,000,000.

The next is the prohibition against administrative promotions which will save $3,264,000.

The prohibition against the filling of vacancies will save $3,033,000.

The reduction in certain rates of postal travel, $1,175,000.

Administrative furloughs will save $12,000,000 this year and next year only $2,000,000, because the personnel in the different departments has been decreased.

The following are other savings made during the next fiscal year by this legislation:

Reduction in the rural carriers' equipment allowance, $9,660,000.

Reductions in jurors' and witnesses' per diems, $868,198.

Reduction in permanent appropriations, $2,943,144.

Suspension of reenlistment allowances in the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, $5,007,725.

Prohibition against increases in pay by reallocations of positions under the Classification Act, $111,055.

Reduction in benefits payable through the Employees' Compensation Commission, $353,333.

Reduction in pensions for wars prior to the Spanish-American War, $7,300,000.

Reduction in pensions payable under private acts, $191,600.

Suspension of automatic promotions, $6,000,000.

Mr. SIROVICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. SIROVICH. In 1928 the Republican organization under President Coolidge gave an increase of $18,000,000 to the Federal employees in terms of $60, $120, and $180 increase. Through the Federal Economy Act they have deprived them of $175,000,000. Does the gentleman think that is just?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; it is just. Let me tell the gentleman why I think so. Those employed by the Government, particularly in these distressing times, are in a very favorable position compared with the many millions of our citizens who are unemployed, partially employed, or otherwise acutely suffering from depression conditions. The Government compensation, annual leave with pay, sick leave with pay, half-holiday leave with pay, regularity and assurance of pay, retirement benefits, and tenure protection, make public service attractive in normal times and doubly desirable—even with pay reduction—in times of wide-spread unemployment and economic and financial distress. Viewed as a group, our Federal employees are a fortunate part of our citizenship at present.

The Government wage is in excess of the wage of all other low-class employees in private industry, even with the 15-percent reduction.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman realize that over 220,000 Federal employees receive less than a thousand dollars a year?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not realize that fact. I have a report that I requested from the Labor Department, and that report shows that the employees in private industry have been reduced 21 to 51 percent more than the Government employees.

Mr. SIROVICH. I have a report which shows that in the military and naval forces there are 2,320 receiving less than a thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I was not referring to the enlisted men of the Army or the Navy, who, in addition to their pay the gentleman has referred to, get their subsistence, quarters, clothing, and other perquisites.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. Does the gentleman believe that an employee getting less than a thousand dollars should be cut the same amount as the man receiving high wages?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If I had my way, I might exempt from that deduction the low-salaried employees, but every man cannot have his own way in legislation. There must be compromise, and I am not one of those who is so darn stubborn that he believes he is right all the time and that the other fellow is wrong all the time.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Sixty percent of the employees in the Government receive less than $2,000 and 125,000 receive less than $1,000.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; and how many millions of citizens in the United States do not even receive $50 a month or $600 a year? And the gentleman is also referring in the $1,000 group to a very large number of enlisted men in the Army and Navy, who, I have just said, get subsistence, quarters, clothing, and so forth, in addition to their cash compensation.

Mr. MOTT. May I ask the gentleman another question? The gentleman stated he thought a graduated pay cut would be better, and I agree with him. What would be the objection to voting down this rule and allowing us to make that provision in this law?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me tell the gentleman something. I have no tolerance with any man, whether he be on the Democratic or Republican side, who stands up in this Chamber and opposes the recovery program of the President of the United States.

Mr. MOTT. I do not admit that that is opposing the recovery program.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I say it is.

Mr. MOTT. I am stating that it is a better way, and asking the gentleman if he does not agree with that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have told the gentleman my convictions upon that. I shall not yield any more, because there are many things I want to say. Let me tell the gentleman something else. The gentleman may or may not be one of those who did it, but there were 65 Republicans on that side of the House who voted for this identical legislation in the last extra session of Congress.

Mr. MOTT. And I venture to say that nine tenths of them are very sorry for it now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. They may be sorry now they did it, because this immediately precedes an election year, but when the next election comes on, when our country shall have recovered, they will be very proud of it.

Mr. RICH. Is this a political quabble or is it something for the good of this country?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes; the gentleman's side is making it one.

Mr. RICH. We thank the gentleman very much for that information.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is my judgment. Here is Mr. SNELL speaking when this identical legislation was before the House last spring. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, what few words I say relative to the legislation before us at this time are not said either as a Republican or as a Democrat. They are said as a loyal American citizen, who desires to meet the duties that come to him as a Representative in this House.

As a loyal American citizen—not as a Republican, not as a Democrat! Your distinguished Republican leader says he makes them as a loyal American citizen. He supported and voted for this legislation at that time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Wait a minute. An election is coming on, and it has been one of the weaknesses or the strength of the Republican Party to appeal to organized minorities in the country.

Mr. TABER. But that bill did not carry a repeal of the antideficiency laws of this country.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It carried the same provisions that are embraced within this rule in title II of this bill.

Mr. TABER. But that provision was not in it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Oh, the gentleman says it did not carry the little routine administrative provisions that authorize a department to incur a deficiency. They did not tell you how that was. They can incur a deficiency only if the cost of living goes up and a part of that 10-percent reduction is restored. They can incur that deficiency only on a specific order from the President specifying the amount, and it shall not be any greater than the exact sum necessary to pay the raise in the salary that he gives them. This opposition to that provision is all just a subterfuge, just an excuse these gentlemen are hunting up to attack this bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No one will undertake to base his objection to this particular provision that is now being discussed upon the ground stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. BUCHANAN. Of course not. I want to read a little more from the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me finish with Mr. SNELL. You have in this bill a salary reduction of 10 percent. He was supporting a salary reduction of 15 percent in March last. Let us see what he said then:

> Several months ago I took the floor and asked that responsibility for this kind of work be given to the then President of the United States. The Democratic majority did not all agree with me then; why, I do not know; but I have not changed my position one iota. I stand now as I stood then. If you are going to accomplish this purpose, you must put it up to the President of the United States and hold him responsible. This is not a time or place to review or discuss bygones. * * *
> Every part of this country is in a terrible situation and waiting for affirmative action by Congress. Every municipality, town, county, and State is cutting down its appropriations and cutting down salaries of its officials, and I tell you, Mr. Speaker, we must set the example here. We must put the Federal house in order first. That is the crux of the whole situation. It is up to you men to do your duty here today and give the President an opportunity to do the things that he says are absolutely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat the speech of the majority leader, Mr. SNELL, to the Democratic membership of this House. It is up to you to give the President that legislation which constitutes an integral part of his recovery program, that he might proceed to accomplish the purposes he started out to accomplish. I could quote practically the same thing from my friend, the ranking minority member of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. He emphasized the fact that salaries ought to be cut by the Federal Government. Why then have they changed front in 9 months? In favor of the cut last March or April, against the cut now.

Mr. TABER. Has the gentleman been speaking about me? I have not changed my position on the right to cut, but I do not believe in a rule which permits the antideficiency laws to be repealed without a fair vote. I believe in going down the line just as I went before, notwithstanding the President has run out on us with this extravagance program that he has put across.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Now, one other thing. I know, as Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, that salaries in the regular Government departments and independent establishments are based on the schedules in the Classification Act. It came to my attention that in the emergency agencies, they were not based on that act, but they were paying higher salaries in some of those organizations. I immediately wrote every one of those emergency organizations, and I immediately got in contact and conference with the President on that subject. I am glad to say that on November 18 the President issued an Executive order directing that the salaries be placed on pay schedules approximating those of the Classification Act, and that all of them sustain the 15-percent cut that was then in existence. More of these agencies have been organized since then. Just 3 days ago the President issued another Executive order which took within its scope every emergency agency now organized or hereafter to be organized, making them base their salaries upon the classification schedules, and subjecting them to whatever pay reduction the law requires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with close attention to the 30-minute speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], who is chairman of the Appropriations Committee. I submit to you that he did not touch the merits of the question of continued slashing of the moderate wages of governmental workers.

He referred to Members on this side who voted for the so-called "Economy Act" of March 20, 1933, and argued that they should vote the same way today. The fact is that we embarked on a new and better policy through the National Industrial Recovery Act of June 16, and those who vote against this rule today are voting for the principles of that act. He urged all Members to follow the President, forgetting that it is unwise to attempt to follow in opposite directions at the same time.

For myself, while I voted against the original so-called "Economy Act" as one calculated to drag us deeper into depression, I yield to no one on this floor in earnest and enthusiastic support of the National Industrial Recovery Act, which is the key of the President's recovery program. I believe that measure to be the most fundamental, far-reaching, and forward-looking legislation enacted during my service in Congress.

That great measure is based on the philosophy that cooperation can and should be substituted for cut-throat competition in American industry and business. It provides a method for teamwork on the part of capital, labor, and the Government for the attainment of the supreme objective, increased purchasing power through increased wages. The President has appealed with all his splendid earnestness and eloquence to private employers of the land to increase their wage payments and shorten working hours so that the additional income will create orders for the products which factory and farm are eager to supply.

Here today we have a nullification project. Here is a program which runs counter to every principle of the recovery program. This announcement that Congress intends to continue the wage-cutting program into 1935, and reduce the purchasing power of faithful employees, is so inconsistent that it cannot be explained away. Little wonder that the supporters of this rule and the provisions it makes in order do not even make the attempt.

Mr. Speaker, if the recovery program to revive American business through increased wages and purchasing power is right, this wage-cutting program is wrong. Both cannot be right. I am convinced that the National Industrial Recovery Act is fundamentally sound and right. There has not been, and there is not now, any other way to emerge from the swamp of depression save through a restoration of buying power in the hands of Americans. Then, why do we not have faith enough and courage enough to follow the right course as to those workers for whose wage standards Congress is alone responsible?

I am frank to say that the N.R.A. has not proved its effectiveness as yet. The one weak point, which may prove fatal, is wage pay rolls as compared to price and production.

Sometime ago I asked the Research Division of the Federal Reserve Board to prepare a table for me showing the relation of price, production, and pay rolls in November 1933 as compared to the average for the year 1926, which by common agreement is the best year to serve as a standard for our recovery efforts.

The figures furnished were illuminating. Wholesale prices and industrial production were exactly balanced in November 1933. Employment, including all part-time employment, was a little more favorable than either prices or production. But pay rolls, the very key to success, because they embody the purchasing power which alone can sustain prices and production, were 16 points behind prices and production.

That gulf must be bridged or prices and production will collapse. The figures show that the N.R.A. has not sinned in the direction of too high wages but rather in the direction of too low wages. The codes must be revised upward as to wages and downward as to hours of labor.

What position is the Government in to take that necessary step while it cuts the wages of its own workers? Private employers know the present inconsistency. One of them from my own district said to me the other day, "The Government had better stop cutting wages itself before it asks us to increase wages." The best thing we can do here and now is to put the blue eagle over the post offices and every other place where employees labor for Uncle Sam. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am not going to waste my time by denouncing this ruthless, utterly unjustifiable gag rule. It offends against the principles of representative government. Every Member who votes for it deliberately chooses to rob himself of rights which belong to his office and to prevent this House from acting as a deliberative, legislative body.

I want to address myself during this limited time to the provisions of law which this rule makes in order, and in effect enacts into law without real discussion or possibility of amendment.

First, it means a wage cut of 10 percent for every worker in the Government service, no matter how small may be his pay. I have on my desk a letter from an old and worthy constituent, who for 28 years has been a light attendant under the Bureau of Lighthouses. He looks after lights on the Monongahela River, and every evening and every morning, in winter and in summer, he crosses the river to look after his lights. His regular pay is $12 a month—a month, not a week.

He writes me that under the Economy Act now in force he loses $1.80 every month out of that pittance. He states that this cut is cruel, in view of the fact that he has no other income and is compelled to buy a boat every 3 years in order to perform his duties.

In the Postal Service, with which I am most familiar, there are about 30,000 apprentices, known as postal substitutes. They are essential to the conduct of the great Post Office Service. They are paid by the hour for the hours they work. They report at their various post offices every day for duty. For the last 2 years they have been able to secure only trifling employment, due to the fact that there are "floating" regulars who are used for the work which formerly went to the substitutes. Vacancies through death and retirement are not filled, thus shutting off the chance for appointment for the substitutes. These are not boys but men who have served years in the hope that some day they might secure a place in the regular service. Many of them are married, struggling to support their families on four or five dollars a week. Ten percent of their miserable pay will be deducted under this program for 1935. We have made a worthy attempt to end sweatshop wages in private industry. It might be well to end sweatshop wages under the flag of the United States, where Congress has the sole power and responsibility. [Applause.]

Let me quote the words of one of these substitutes in the Postal Service who is now facing the actual conditions which apply in many thousands of instances. He writes:

> We have in this office at the present time 46 substitutes. Of this number 27 are married and 16 have children. Only three of us have no one dependent upon ourselves for support.
> The senior substitute has 7 years and 2 months' service and the junior substitute has 4 years' service.
> We have never been furloughed compulsorily, not because of consideration for us but simply to have us available in case of emergency, there having been periods of 2 and 3 weeks when none of us have been employed a single hour.

We have received a total of $175 in contributions, the proceeds of a fund collected by the regular employees, to provide relief for our destitute members. The regulars also absented themselves during March 1932 for 1 day without pay by permission of the local authorities, it being agreed that substitutes would be employed to replace them an equivalent number of hours.

Until several months ago we found it impossible to obtain relief from the charitable agencies due to our being regarded by them as having jobs. Despite the fact that we were to all practical purposes unemployed, however, after prolonged agitation, the Federal Relief Administrator interceded in our behalf and directed the local relief agencies to show no discrimination against us. As a result several men are now receiving aid.

The average substitute's age is 28 years. We all have borrowed to the limit. Should we receive regular appointments immediately it would take the majority of us several years to emerge from debt. Some of the men have lost their homes, and other have been dependent entirely on the charity of friends and relatives.

I know the argument is made that the lowered cost of living applies to these substitutes and other small-pay employees. Therefore, they should stand the pay reduction in the same percentage as the others. It is not an argument; it is sheer cruelty. When full pay even under the best of conditions means hardship and want, the reduction of a few dollars is an inhuman practice.

I am opposed to basing wages on solely a cost-of-living basis. That is the theory underlying these wage provisions. The President was given power to determine the cost of living during the first 6 months of 1928 and use that as a base period. Then he is to determine the difference in cost of living during each 6 months' period and compare it with the base period.

Already we have had three such determinations and each time the announcement has come that the cost of living has not yet reached a point which would permit an advance in pay. The last announcement was based on statistics which no Member of this House understands. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, in promulgating the findings on which the President acted, made the following statement:

As a basis for this determination information was obtained on the expenditures of different types of Federal employees at both dates, through detailed schedules filled out in personal interview with employees whose names were chosen by lot, and through 2 questionnaires, 1 sent to all employees and 1 to a large sample of employees whose names likewise were chosen by lot.

From these data the quantity and the cost of different goods and services purchased by Federal employees in the first 6 months of 1928 have been ascertained. The cost of the same bill of goods and services in December 1933 has been computed, and index numbers have been calculated showing relative costs of the two periods. Prices have been collected which make it possible to calculate living costs in March 1933, but they have not yet been summarized.

Taking costs in the first 6 months of 1928 as 100, the index of the average cost of living for all Federal employees in the District for December 1933, was 85.4, showing a decline of 14.6 percent.

SEPARATE INDICES MADE

In addition to the index for all employees, separate indices have been computed for the families of 3 categories of employees—custodial, with salaries less than $2,500; others with salaries below $2,500, and those with salaries of $2,500 or more. An index was also computed for single individuals living in rented rooms, of whom there are about 10,000. The indices for these groups are as follows:

Custodial, with salaries less than $2,500, 83.4 percent.
Other employees with salaries less than $2,500, 85.1 percent.
Employees with salaries over $2,500, 85 percent.
Single individuals living in rented rooms, 88 percent.

Mr. Speaker, the practice of "casting lots" comes down from ancient times, but it ought to be possible to devise a better plan in 1934 for dealing with human problems which mean happiness or misery for Americans.

This whole cost-of-living theory is old and decrepit and should be laid beneath the sod. It is based on the belief that wages is that pay which will keep a worker alive and enable him to produce another worker to take his place. That theory would destroy all advancement and paralyze all progress. To say that a certain period in 1928 shall be the very maximum of achievement is unworthy from every standpoint.

Were the wages in that sacred period adequate to a decent American standard of living? They were not. At that time 124,000 Government employees out of a total of 700,000 received less than $1,000 a year and 417,000 received less than $2,000 a year.

Wages must not be fixed beyond chance of advancement. They must depend upon productivity and service. There must be an ever-increasing standard of living through increased income if this mass-production system is not to bury us all under the debris of an industrial order out of all control. The very heart and goal of the new deal must be the true deal of human advancement and growth.

There is another provision in these measures which it is sought here to reenact for 1935. That is the ban against promotions within the service. It means great additions to the pay cut for a great host of workers.

The President, in his Budget message, recognizes this injustice as far as it applies to the military services. He said:

Among the legislative provisions appended hereto is one prohibiting automatic increases in compensation except in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. The personnel of these three services are engaged in a life service to their country. Some, by reason of the pay freezes, have sustained reduction in compensation of more than 25 percent. They are, therefore, in a different category from those in other governmental agencies. They should, in 1935, be released from the restrictions on automatic increases in compensation.

He is right that the ban should be lifted on promotions in the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps. These promotions are part of the agreement when men enter these services, and they should be faithfully maintained. But exactly the same arguments, and with even greater force, apply to the civil-service employees. They, too, enter upon a life service. They, too, in many instances have suffered a loss of more than 25 percent of what they should receive.

Take the Railway Postal Service, an indispensable part of the job of getting mail from the sender to the addressee. The situation faced by a grade 2 terminal clerk is as follows:

Loss on promotion, fiscal year 1934	$150.00
Loss on salary (15 percent)	300.00
Loss on night differential (15 percent)	30.00
Loss on payless furlough (first quarter)	51.25
	531.25

Salary, $2,000.
Percentage of loss, 26.56.

Grade 2 clerk assigned to road duty on June 30, 1933, due to be promoted to grade 3 July 1, 1933. Promotion lost under provisions of present Economy Act.

Loss on promotion, fiscal year 1934	$150.00
Loss on salary (15 percent)	300.00
Loss on night differential (15 percent), 1934	30.00
Loss on travel allowance (33⅓ percent), 1934	87.00
Loss on payless furlough (first quarter 1934)	51.25
	618.25

Salary, $2,000.
Percentage of loss, 30.91.

Post-office clerks and letter carriers in the lower grades meet the same additional wage cuts, reducing their incomes by 25 percent and more in some cases.

The Appropriations Committee has modified the President's request so that the advances will apply between grades and not effect the longevity increases. At present vacancies in the captain rank can be filled by a lieutenant only through Executive order. The modified provision will permit this promotion in regular course and without Executive order. Exactly the same condition is found in the Postal Service. At present a post-office clerk cannot be given the pay of an assistant superintendent of mails without an Executive order. He may do the work, and in many cases he does, but he cannot be paid the salary which goes with the position. Is there any reason why this civil-service employee should not be placed on the same basis as the military-service employee? Yet the provisions which this rule will enact contain that unjustified discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, there are other features of this program which I have not time to describe. There are furloughs to hang over the head of every employee and to descend with deadly force upon many. There are reductions in travel allowances, even though the employee must pay this additional sum from his pay in the performance of his required duties.

The whole program is unsound and inhuman. It is not recovery medicine but depression poison. It was said at first that these drastic measures entailed hardships, but they must be endured for the sake of a balanced Budget and to maintain the credit of the United States. We heard that thundered forth last March, but it is expressed in a still small voice today. Then we saw a picture of a balanced Budget for next July 1. Now we are told that, although the wage cuts were made, the Budget will be out of balance by $7,000,000,000!

We saved about $135,000,000 by the 15-percent wage cut, and we spent $341,000,000 for the civilian conservation camps. With that $135,000,000 spent by Government workers, turning over and over in the channels of business, a large part of those in the conservation camps could have been occupied in normal employment.

Mr. Speaker, the National Budget will not be balanced until Americans get an opportunity to balance their own budgets on decent income levels. Purchasing power will create orders for idle factories and idle workers and nothing else will.

As to the credit of the Government, it should not be entirely forgotten that that word "credit" is used in connection with those who pay their just obligations. A miser may have great hoards of money, but if he will not pay his obligations he is not entitled to credit in business.

The Government has an obligation to maintain the wage standards fixed by laws enacted in regular procedure. They were part of the agreements made with workers when they entered the various departments and services. They were low in the best of times, but American citizens accepted them and the fact that they could never expect to win any high rewards in return for security of position and income. This understanding was not a legal contract and it cannot be enforced in a court of law. I maintain that it is a moral contract, and that the credit of the Government would be strengthened by keeping it.

The fact that private employers were forced to lower wages below any cut suffered by Government employees does not give warrant to governmental wage cuts. It simply proves that private business, dependent upon profits for existence, must take desperate measures even though they destroy general purchasing power and injure the community. The individual may be forced to do what should not be done in view of the public interest. The Government is under no such compulsion, for it can do those things which are for the common good and use its efforts to help bring those conditions where private business may do the same.

Mr. Speaker, we talk about figures and percentages but beyond them are lives and homes. Cutting a few dollars from small incomes means lack of shoes and clothing for school children, lost educational opportunities for young men and women. It means lapsed insurance policies, loss of homes because mortgage payments cannot be met. It means that the help given unemployed relatives is made impossible with consequent added burdens to relief and welfare agencies. It means privation and suffering in many forms.

Let us end such a policy and adopt the true recovery principle that increased wages and purchasing power alone can end this monstrous situation where all of us suffer because too much is produced. Let us end this wage reduction which takes income, not only from faithful and efficient Government workers but from American industry and trade and agriculture. Vote this rule down. Restore these wage levels to the very moderate standards set by Congress in orderly procedure. That is marching forward, not backward. It will bring encouragement to every worker in the land. It is a stride on the road to recovery. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in accordance with my agreement, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. O'MALLEY].

Mr. O'MALLEY. Mr. Speaker, I shall not consume all of the 3 minutes. I merely want to call to the attention of the Members upon the Democratic side that in this rule we are asked to vote not only upon the proposition of giving help to those who have been unjustly harmed by the Economy Act passed last spring but if the rule is voted it will prevent us during the rest of this session of the Seventy-third Congress from offering any amendments to any other appropriation bills that may come in here, even though we desire to right any wrongs caused by the Economy Act.

Personally, I do not want to vote to bind the Members of my party against doing anything they may want to do in the rest of this session to correct injustices that may have occurred in previous appropriation bills and injustices growing out of the Economy Act itself that was passed in the special session.

I shall vote against this rule because I do not want to force upon my colleagues a restriction upon their action in the future and because I do not want to force them into a position where they cannot do anything about any appropriation bills yet to come before us. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, to save time, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the rule may have permission to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, in Massachusetts recently I attended a reception given by postal workers. Three or four postmasters were there. I overheard two of them sitting next to me having a discussion as to whether they had remembered to put the blue eagle in the windows of their respective post offices or whether they had forgotten it. I was introduced to speak after I had heard this discussion, and I turned to these postmasters and said: "You gentlemen are all wrong on this proposition. The blue eagle is for concerns which have raised wages and shortened hours. The United States Government has cut wages and lengthened hours of its employees, so what you ought to have in your post offices, as well as in all other Government departments, is a black hawk. [Applause.] Let us hope you may soon be entitled to display the blue eagle, because the blue eagle represents higher wages and shorter hours, and let us hope that the Government will soon do away with the black eagle of long hours and cut wages. The United States Government should be consistent and place its own employees under the N.I.R.A."

If you Members of the House here today want to help labor, if you want to help the underpaid Government employee, if you want to help the World War veteran, the Spanish War veteran—37 suicides of Spanish War veterans took place in the State of Massachusetts alone within 3 months after the passage of the economy bill—if you want to help those veterans, the Civil War veterans, and all the underpaid people in the Government service, you will vote down this rule, because this is the first strategic move in the battle for the veterans and labor, and the first fight comes on this rule.

We have heard a lot about the cost of living not having gone up sufficiently to warrant the removal of the 15 percent cut on Government employees. I think such an argument is answered pretty fully in this speech delivered by Harry King, a department store owner and former head of the Washington Chamber of Commerce. These figures are now the confirmed and official figures of the Department of Labor. I shall read his statement from the Washington News:

LIVING COSTS ARE OUTDATED AS WHOLESALE PRICES RISE—PRESIDENT'S DETERMINATION WAS BASED ON RETAIL FIGURES, NOT YET AFFECTED BY N.R.A. BOOSTS IN MANUFACTURING EXPENSES

By C. A. F.

If there is any cheer to be drawn from the President's order for continuation of the full 15 percent Government cut until July 1, here it is: The cost-of-living basis for determining Government salaries is likely to be so thoroughly discredited before July 1 that the President and Congress will be convinced of the need for junking it.

The reasons for that statement were given in a public address not long ago by Harry King, department store owner and former head of the Washington Chamber of Commerce, and they are now confirmed by official figures of the Labor Department.

King said that when N.R.A. was being organized "every merchant knew that with increased costs for labor in manufacturing industries prices would rise. Every merchant went into the market and bought, at low prices, quantities of goods that would stock him for many months.

RETAILERS MUST FOLLOW

"The merchants", King continued, "sold this merchandise on the basis of what it cost them. But now most of it is sold. Hardly an item can be replaced by the merchant without paying 15 to 40 percent more and, in some cases, 100 percent more, to the manufacturer or jobber. Spring merchandise will be much higher to the consumer as well as to the retailer."

The Labor Department's confirmation is in its report of wholesale prices for the week ended December 30. It showed that since March 4 prices of all commodities have increased 19 percent. Farm products have gone up 40 percent; textile products, 50 percent; house furnishing goods, 11 percent.

WORKING OF N.R.A.

The 19-percent jump for all commodities is traceable to operation of the N.R.A. codes, which set minimum wages and also prohibit selling under cost. Labor Department officials agree these higher costs in manufacturing have not yet been reflected in prices to the consumer, but that they must show their effect when the retailers begin to sell their spring merchandise.

LAW SETS FIXED PATTERN

The Labor Department survey on which the President's continuation of the full 15 percent cut is based could not, under the law, take into account this changing factor. Nor could the President depart from the letter of the statute, which prescribes that average living costs for the 6 months just ended must be compared with the first 6 months of 1928.

Even the special survey conducted in Washington could not depart from the legal pattern. It could not consider the "human side", nor could it estimate the probabilities of the next few months. It had to be a statistical statement of what it cost to live (based on retail prices) in the last 6 months of 1933 as compared with exactly the same manner of living in the first 6 months of 1928.

NO CREDIT FOR DEFENDANTS

The law assumed that all persons lived exactly the same in 1933 as in 1928. The Labor Department survey has shown that is far from the truth. In particular, Government employees have many dependents they did not have in 1928. Most of them are unemployed relatives being supported wholly or largely by the people with steady jobs.

The law takes no account of them.

NEW LAW ONLY REMEDY

The only hope of a remedy lies in a revised law, for which many officials devoutly hope. The only way of getting a revised law is for Congress to enact it. Congress probably will not act unless the President recommends it. Congress cannot act at all after its adjournment, which most forecasters say will be well before July 1.

It comes down to this. It is all right to refer to statistics compiled by the Department of Labor, to show that the cost of living has not gone up. But 1928 and 1933 are very far apart as to living conditions. The Post Office employee and all of the Government workers, when they go into the grocery stores and into various retail establishments to buy merchandise, are not following the Department of Labor statistics. They are following the prices that they actually must pay that retail store.

The cost of living has gone up, and it is going up higher within the next few months. It seems to me totally inconsistent for the United States Government to take the stand it has in this matter. You will remember the principles we fought for in the Black-Connery 30-hour week bill, which eventuated into the N.I.R.A. during the last session. I am 100 percent for the principle of the N.I.R.A., but I believe that in justice to all industry in the United States and in justice to labor you will have to come to a 30-hour week, not to a 40-hour week, not a 35-hour week, not a 32-hour week. You will have to come to a 30-hour, 5-day week, 6-hour day if you want to put the people of the United States to work and really relieve the unemployment situation in industry.

In the 30-hour week bill we sought the right of collective bargaining, the abolition of child labor, the abolition of the "yellow dog" contract, and the right of labor to organize. We talk about minimum wages and shortening the hours of labor. The letter carrier who walks the street in front of your house sees men in the woolen mills, or factories, or whatever industry you may have in your district. He sees his own wages cut down to the bone. He sees the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States saying to the manufacturer: "Bring up your wages. Shorten your hours." Then to his amazement he is told by the United States Government (although he, as a Government employee, should be used as an example by the Government to lead the way to industry in wages and hours under the banner of the N.R.A.): "We have cut your pay and we are going to keep down your wages instead of giving you the decent living wage which we insist your neighbors shall have." And remember, these Government employees did not get a decent living wage when times were good. They did not get a really decent living wage at any time. Remember, I am referring to all Government employees. I merely take the Postal Service as an example, because they are the ones with whom you most often come in personal contact. Many of them could have gone out into private industry and could have received five times the amount being paid them by the Government, on account of their brains and ability. But, due to loyalty to the United States Government over a long period of years when times were good they did not go to private industry and get the money to which they would be entitled. They stayed with the Government and were loyal to the United States, and for doing that we penalize them at this time by cutting their pay. I think it is all wrong.

Mr. SIROVICH. Does the gentleman realize that in our country we have starvation wages, living wages, and saving wages; starvation wages that starve the body and mind, living wages that keep body and soul barely together, and the time has come when the people have to save in times of affluence in order to take care of themselves in times of adversity.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman from New York, my friend the distinguished doctor, is absolutely correct in his statement. We have passed the days when the country will stand for either starvation wages or mere living wages. The working people demand their place in the sun and will have it. The day of the saving wage is here, thanks to the courage, humanity, and statesmanship of President Roosevelt, who has given new hope to the exploited workers of industry in the country by his program for high wages, saving of homes and farms, and the N.I.R.A. But let us be consistent. Let us put the Government workers under the N.R.A. and make them proud to work for an Uncle Sam who brings them into the family fold of all self-respecting workers of the country and does not treat them like stepchildren to be driven out into the forests of despair to be devoured by the wolves of long hours and low wages.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. In conclusion may I say: If you are for the worker and the veteran, vote down this rule. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

GAG RULE

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of high wages. I have always voted for high wages. Wage earners must receive good wages in order to be good buyers. I have always voted against what is known as the "gag rule."

HOW VETERANS AFFECTED

We have before us today a situation that we must soon face. We will have to cast our votes on a rule that is known as a "gag rule." It is really not entitled to that name, but if our opponents get any consolation out of it, we will admit it. The distinguished gentleman who preceded me said:

If you are in favor of the veterans, vote against this rule.

I want to make the statement that there is nothing in this rule that will make out of order any amendment on veterans' legislation that would be in order if we did not pass the rule.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I will ask the distinguished gentleman from Alabama, a ranking member of the Rules Committee, if that is correct?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is absolutely correct. There is no question about that.

Mr. PATMAN. So we can dismiss veterans' legislation from consideration when we vote on the rule.

Mr. LUNDEEN. But it does apply to the widows of Civil War veterans, does it not?

Mr. PATMAN. Only 10 percent off the Civil War veterans' widows, and if the World War widows can take a 100 percent reduction and the Spanish-American War widows can take a 50-percent reduction on non-service-connected cases, certainly the Civil War widows can take a 10-percent reduction on non-service-connected cases.

Mr. LUNDEEN. They cannot take it without starving to death.

FEDERAL EMPLOYEES MAY GET ALL RESTORED

Mr. PATMAN. The civil-service employees will have restored in this bill an appropriation from July 1 of this year—1934—until June 30 next year—1935—covering 33⅓ percent of what they have lost. The bill also provides that the President may restore the other 66⅔ of the reduction when the cost of living increases. I should like to see them get it all back, but remember this, gentlemen, that we have a very definite program for recovery that we are trying to follow. We do not want to disrupt that program. I do not believe the Federal employees desire to run the risk of injuring economic recovery by insisting upon whole restoration of salaries at this time when they may get total restoration anyway.

HOMES SAVED

When the present leader in the White House came into power there were millions of people all over this Nation on bended knees praying that some way would be devised that would permit them to save their homes. I saw old men and old women break down and cry like little children because they were losing their homes. This condition existed all over this country. This program for national recovery sponsored by President Roosevelt is saving the homes of millions of people. The program calls for the use of the Government credit of this Nation for the purpose of saving people's homes and reducing the high interest burden which those people have been forced to bear. This is not only saving the homes of people in cities but saving the homes of people on the farms. They are not only given a longer time to pay their mortgage debts but in many cases they are scaled down, and in all cases the interest rate is considerably reduced. The leader in the White House is responsible for it. He is the man that we are following today.

DESTITUTION RELIEVED

When this depression started the statement was made: "Why can you not use Federal funds to relieve destitution?" "No", it was said, "it is unconstitutional to do that. We cannot do it." But our present leader said, "We have to do it, it must be done", and he has relieved people all over this Nation and gave them food, clothing, and necessities from Federal funds. President Hoover told the destitute to go to the Red Cross.

UNEMPLOYED HELP

When this depression started it was said, "Why can there not be some way devised that will permit people who are unemployed and who are able and willing and anxious to work to find some kind of job that will enable them to provide a living for themselves and their families?" and this great leader has provided a way for millions and millions of these people to work and to provide a livelihood for themselves and their families. Mr. Hoover told this large group to go to the Red Cross.

Mr. GLOVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I shall be pleased to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GLOVER. I regard the gentleman as being our best authority on veterans' legislation. Many of us hope to see legislation passed at this Congress for the relief of Spanish-American War veterans and other veterans whom we think ought to have relief. Do I understand the gentleman to say, based on his knowledge of veterans' affairs, that nothing in this rule would prevent us from considering legislation that is now pending affecting that very question?

Mr. PATMAN. I thank the gentleman for the compliment, but I am not entitled to be called an authority on veterans' legislation; however, that is my understanding in regard to veterans' affairs inquired about; and, furthermore, the Chairman of the World War Veterans' Committee, the Honorable JOHN E. RANKIN, has already announced that there will be hearings on veterans' legislation, and there is nothing in this rule that you vote for that will prevent such legislation from passing this House or in any way interfering with it. It is ridiculous and absurd for one to vote against this rule on the theory that it will be detrimental to veterans.

Mr. ZIONCHECK, Mr. O'MALLEY, and Mr. BRITTEN rose.

Mr. PATMAN. Obviously, gentlemen, I cannot yield to all of you. I have only 2 or 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THOMASON). The gentleman from Texas has declined to yield.

FARMERS HELPED

Mr. PATMAN. Not only has this program been adopted for the purpose of relieving destitution and giving people jobs but also to restore the purchasing power of the farmers of this country, and may I invite the attention of my friend from Massachusetts, Mr. MONNERY, to the fact that I was in Lynn, Mass., a couple of years ago and shoe workers there were walking the streets? They were unemployed. Why? Because there was no market for shoes; and I am very pleased to tell the gentleman that the people in the South and the West and in the agricultural sections of the country are buying more shoes today than they ever bought before because the purchasing power is being restored to people who need shoes, and I hope the time will soon come when his section will be able to put all the shoe workers to work, but certainly this will not be done until purchasing power is restored. The President is determined to restore farm prices.

PRESIDENT AGAINST IT

I should like to see the Federal employees get all their pay back, especially the ones receiving salaries less than $3,000 annually, but this great leader of ours, who says he is going to relieve destitution, give unemployed people jobs, save people's homes in the cities and on the farms, and restore the buying power of the people, does not want this pay restored now and I am not going to do anything that would have a tendency to disrupt his program, because it is a great program. It is relieving distress and misery and bringing happiness and prosperity to many of our people. We want it to go onward and forward. All of us cannot be leaders. We must follow someone in a time like this who has a constructive program. We cannot expect a program to be presented that we will agree with in its entirety.

Mr. CONNERY and Mr. SIROVICH rose.

Mr. PATMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, because I mentioned the gentleman's name. Sorry I do not have the time to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman mentioned my name and I understood the gentleman to say that the people were all employed in Lynn, Mass. There are a number of shoe workers not employed and they will not be employed until we go to the 30-hour week. The gentleman also states that this rule does not affect the veterans. Such a legislative provision on an appropriation bill is the way we took the money away from the veterans the last time, and by defeating this rule we can give the money back to the veterans in the same way, but if we adopt the rule we cannot do it under this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. PATMAN. Any amendment that would be in order without this rule will still be in order with it, I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the members of the Rules Committee will bear me out in this statement. The gentleman can offer an amendment to increase the amount proposed to be appropriated for any class of veterans after this rule is adopted. It will not in any way affect such an amendment.

WILL WE JOIN THE PRESIDENT'S ENEMIES?

Now, suppose it does affect the veterans. What are you going to do? Are you going to disrupt this great program I have been telling you about that involves not only 2 or 3 or 4 million people but involves 50 or 60 or 100 million people? Probably the President is wrong in his views, but he is our President; he is our leader. Are you going to throw any kind of monkey wrench into the program, and will you line up with the President's enemies? Who are they? Well, the Power Trust. They do not like the President because he has not been doing what they wanted done. The speculators do not like him; Wall Street bankers do not like him, and he has hit the international bankers right square between the eyes. The Republican Party does not like him. So are you going to line up with all these groups and jeopardize the whole recovery program in order to try to help the Federal employees get the remaining 10 percent of the 15-percent reduction at this time when they will possibly get it under this bill, anyway. [Applause.]

THE PRESIDENT WITH A GOOD PROGRAM

No President has done more to help laborers, wage earners, farmers, low-salaried people, and just the average man, woman, and child of this country generally than President Roosevelt. I do not agree with him on some of his views in regard to veterans' legislation and reduction of pay to low-salaried Government employees. It seems inconsistent for the Government to reduce pay of low-salaried people and at the same time encourage private industry to increase the pay of low-salaried people. Although I do not agree with the President on some things, yet I believe that he is doing as much to bring this country back as is possible for a President to do. One thing sure, Wall Street representatives cannot go into the back door of the White House and find out what is going to be done in order that they may defraud the people on the stock market by having the information in advance. It is the first time in 12 or 13 years that Wall Street has not had entree to the White House. The President is fighting the battles of the plain people of this country—the poor, the needy, the unemployed, and the ones in financial distress. He is on record in favor of independent business, regulation or prevention of speculation on products of the soil, and restoring the same kind of dollar to the people to pay their debts with that existed when the debts were created. He is at least doing something. He is not sitting down twiddling his thumbs, as some of our former Presidents did in great emergencies. He will probably make mistakes. He has asked the people not to expect him to be right all the time.

EXACT JUSTICE NOT POSSIBLE

The people cannot expect exact justice to be administered by human beings in compliance with general laws for the whole country. There will always be just and meritorious complaints of inequalities and injustices. The broad program, however, is against the rotten, crooked, unscrupulous politicial and financial management of the past and in favor of the general welfare.

WHO WILL BE PLEASED WITH THE PRESIDENT'S DEFEAT

It would be very pleasing indeed to the Mitchells, Morgans, Mellons, and Wiggins for the President to suffer defeat. It would be pleasing to all Wall Street bankers and other credit manipulators and international scoundrels for the President to suffer this temporary defeat, and it would especially be pleasing to the Republican Party and all others who are interested in voting against the President for the sole and only reason that it is good political strategy on their part. I refuse to join the President's enemies, and although I do not agree with all of his program in every detail, I am going to hold up his hand and assist him in his efforts to give the country substantial and lasting prosperity.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. KAHN].

Mrs. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, everyone realizes the necessity for government economy and would not cavil at it under ordinary circumstances, but when in extragovernmental activities we find money is being paid to the employees far in advance of the money paid to the regular governmental people who are doing a faithful work, we realize that this difference in pay breaks down the morale and is bad for the efficiency of the Departments.

I should like to give a few figures showing these discrepancies.

Under the 1930 Classification Act we find clerical and mechanical services paid, grade 1, 55 cents to 60 cents an hour; grade 2, 67 to 70 cents an hour; grade 3, 75 to 80 cents an hour, less the 15 percent reduction.

Under the schedule paid by the extragovernmental activity, the Civil Works Administration, we find that the maximum time for working is 30 hours a week, with certain administrative exceptions, and for purposes of wages the country is divided into three zones, and the authorized maximum pay in each zone is given with their equivalents per month, per year, maximum working time.

Now, we realize that the maximum pay is really the minimum. In the southern zone skilled labor such as I have designated is paid $1 an hour, $135 a month, or $1,560 a year. In the central zone skilled labor is $1.10 an hour, or $148 a month, or $1,716 a year. In the northern zone labor is paid $1.20 an hour, $162 a month, or $1,872 a year. Clerical work is paid in the northern zone $968 a year, $1,092 a year, and $1,240 a year.

Now compare this with the civil-service salaries with 17 percent of the employees receiving less than $1,000 a year base pay, 25 percent getting less than $1,200 a year base pay, and 60 percent getting less than $2,000 a year base pay.

The newspapers of January 8 contain an announcement that the P.W.A. is spending $58,000,000 giving employment to 280,357 men. That would be at a cost of $242 a month per man.

Study the tables inserted and draw your own conclusion.

Now, it seems to me that at least a small portion of this great sum might be used to restore the 15 percent cut and relieve the suffering of the Spanish War veterans and the widows and orphans. [Applause.]

I insert the following figures:

ENROLLMENT, COST, AND PAY OF THE CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Average enrollment is approximately 300,000.

The cost of the first 8 months, April through November, is given as $186,000,000, or an average of $25,250,000 per month.

This makes an average cost per man per month of $77.50.

Wages are paid the men at the rate of $30 base pay, $45 for 5 percent of them, and $36 for an additional 8 percent. At these rates the monthly pay roll would be:

Base pay for 300,000, at $30	$9,000,000
Additional $15 for 5 percent	225,000
Additional $6 for 8 percent	144,000
Total, pay roll	9,369,000

Deducting this from total monthly expenses, we have approximately $13,881,000 for expenses other than pay rolls. This is an average of $46 per month per man, presumably largely for food, shelter, maintenance, clothing, and so forth.

Assuming that a man's necessities, and so forth, procured at this cost are worth $46 a month to him, the C.C.C. workers receive in cash or in value pay as follows:

	5 percent of workers	8 percent of workers	Remainder of workers
Monthly expenses of food, shelter, maintenance, clothing, etc., per man	$46	$46	$46
Monthly base pay and extra allowances	45	36	30
Total per month	91	82	76
Total, per year	1,092	984	912

In comparison with the Army and Navy, even a stronger picture could be presented.

WAGES PAID BY THE CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

The maximum working time for labor is 30 hours a week, with certain administrative exceptions. For purposes of wages the country is divided into three zones, and the authorized maximum pay in each zone is given as follows, with their equivalents per month and per year, maximum working time:

	Per hour rate	Per month equivalent	Per year equivalent
Southern zone:
Skilled	$1.00	$135.00	$1,560
Unskilled	.40	54.00	625
Central zone:
Skilled	1.10	148.50	1,716
Unskilled	.45	60.75	702
Northern zone:
Skilled	1.20	162.00	1,872
Unskilled	.50	67.50	780

Clerical wages are authorized to be paid as follows:

	Base	Intermediate	Operating	Supervision	Technical supervision
Southern zone	$12	$15	.....	$18	$18–$35
Central zone	15	18	.....	21	21– 40
Northern zone	18	21	$24	.....	24– 45
Northern zone, equivalent annuity	956	1,092	1,240	.....	2,340

Compare with civil-service salaries, with 17 percent of employees receiving less than $1,000 a year base pay, 25 percent get less than $1,200 and 60 percent less than $2,000.

PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION, MISCELLANEOUS

Newspapers on January 8 cite an announcement of the P.W.A. that it is spending $58,000,000 in nongovernmental projects in 41 States, thus giving employment for 1 month to 240,357 men. This would be at the cost of $242 per man per month.

Under civil service clerical-mechanical services are paid: Grade 1, 55 to 60 cents per hour; grade 2, 65 to 70 cents per hour; grade 3, 75 to 80 cents per hour. Less 15 percent, 1930 classification skilled labor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, how does the time stand?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THOMASON). The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has 43 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] 53 minutes remaining.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly to find that my position on this legislation is in opposition to our majority members of the Rules Committee. But I am of the opinion that this rule is not necessary to put over the President's recovery program. I do not think that his program needs any such gag rule.

In addition to that, my opposition to this rule is based on the fact that as chairman of one of the legislative committees of the House I do not believe that I have the moral right to preclude that committee of the possibility of considering legislation from now until the termination of this Congress by my act in voting for this rule today.

I am opposed to this rule because it runs from now on and only terminates when we stop work at the end of the session.

Another objection is that we have before us in the Post Office Committee legislation which may be approved by the Postmaster General, and perhaps after a conference with the President it may receive his support, but with this rule adopted we may be prevented from taking any such action.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. No; I am sorry. I have only a few minutes. Let me tell you of some of the discriminations that affect postal employees which are unfair and unjust, because they are called upon to suffer all out of proportion to what most of you Members may realize. The postal employee will not only be called upon to suffer his 10-percent cut, but there will be the continued hazard of the furlough cut hanging over his head. In addition to that, the ban against promotions in the service will be hanging over his head, and in addition to that there is a reduction in the travel allowance in the Railway Mail Service for those men who live away from home nearly as much as they live at home. In addition to that no one may be promoted to a supervisory grade in the Post Office Service except by Executive order, so that some clerks might be performing the duties of a supervisor, assuming the added responsibilities, and yet by a continuation of this program he will draw only the salary of a clerk.

In addition to that, the postmasters have not only suffered the pay cut, but they also suffer a 10-percent cut in the receipts on which their salaries are based. In addition to that the pay schedule and grade of the supervisor in the substation is based upon the number of employees, and the positions made vacant by the retirement of regular employees are filled by substitutes, and that employment does not count in determining the number of supervisors in that office, nor does it count in determining the wages of the supervisory officials in such offices. So, by reason of this rule, I believe we perpetuate not a 10-percent wage cut, but a wage cut that runs all the way from 20 to 25 percent in the Postal Service.

In order that we might approach this question in an intelligent manner, our committee is anxious to take up such discriminations with the Post Office Department and with the President of the United States, and how inconsistent it would be if I should prevent my committee and the President and the Postal Department by my action from further consideration of these matters.

Another question I desire to bring to your attention is the conditions of our substitutes. It is the most deplorable situation we are called upon to meet. The most pathetic figure in my judgment in the employ of the United States today is the poorly paid post-office substitute. No matter where you go, you will find men in every walk of life condemning the Congress of the United States for the indefensible position we find ourselves in in condemning these men to the meager wages which they are receiving as a result of the Economy Act.

Postal substitutes are receiving all the way from $1 to perhaps $20 a week. The average is very low. They are on our charity relief rolls, and in these days of recovery and reform, I merely want to have the privilege to legislate on conditions that are certainly intolerable and indefensible. So I say to you, a rule such as the one we are now considering that applies today, tomorrow, next week, and next month in my judgment is an unjust rule and ought not to be supported by those who believe in eliminating unfair, unjust discriminations in the Postal Service, the Federal service, the Veterans Administration, or any other service. [Applause].

Mr. STUDLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes, I yield.

Mr. STUDLEY. I understood the gentleman to say that some of the substitutes of the post-office employees are on the charity rolls. In New York they cannot get on the charity roll if they are employed by the Government. They have applied to me and asked if anything could be done, men who earn as low as $5 a week and have families to support.

Mr. MEAD. I am in thorough agreement with my colleague from New York. Being a postal substitute is a handicap under existing law, because the minute he tells the employment agency, the welfare or relief officers that he is a postal employee he is unwelcome and he cannot receive the consideration which other citizens are entitled to.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I wonder if the gentleman, as Chairman of the Postal Committee, has thought of remedying this situation. The Civil Service Commission is continuing to hold examinations for postal employees while there is a great surplus of substitute carriers. I wonder if the gentleman would not introduce a bill to take care of that situation so that before we create any more substitutes we will put these substitutes that we now have on a decent living scale. I think the Members would vote for a bill of that kind.

Mr. MEAD. I thank the gentleman. He makes a good point, but we will not be able to enact such legislation under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, in 10 minutes I shall not be able to follow my usual inclination and yield whenever a colleague asks me to, because I do think it very important to reiterate and clear up, if it is possible to clear up, one or two very obvious misapprehensions with reference to the effect of the proposed rule. In the first place let this be thoroughly understood, and I direct my remarks particularly to my colleagues on the Democratic side. There is no possible question or shadow of a doubt about the fact that the President desires to have this legislation. Entirely separate and apart from what my individual idea about the merits of it may be, or yours, there is no doubt about that fact, because the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in company with the subcommittee chairmen, waited upon the President and conferred with him at length. He considered the matter deliberately and carefully, and heard there from some of the members of that gathering some of the arguments that have been made here today, and the President considers a continuation of these provisions of his economy program absolutely essential for the next fiscal year. I do not hesitate to say to you, as I said to the President, that I should like to see the full amounts for salary restoration July 1 put in the bills, with the continued right in the President to make reductions if necessary, but, gentlemen, we are in war today, an economic war, just as we were some months ago.

It is true we have advanced. Many of the people who were then starving are now eating, but it is no time for me, a private in the ranks, to undertake to distract the attention of the Commander in Chief on a matter of strategy. I must, if I am a soldier, yield my individual opinions at certain points, and that is what the President has asked the Members of Congress to do today.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I cannot yield in 10 minutes.

Now, let us get one matter definitely out of the way right now. There is absolutely nothing in this rule which in any way precludes any effort that anybody desires to make to reinstate veterans' relief. If any gentleman wishes to challenge that, I will yield to him.

Mr. MAY and Mr. CONNERY rose.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. CONNERY. This rule precludes an amendment to this appropriation bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. No, sir; it does not. I know the gentleman is sincere. This rule precludes amendment to title II of the Economy Act. Title II is not the veterans' part of the Economy Act.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; it is; I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; title II is not. Title I is the part of the Economy Act dealing with veterans.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. In just a moment I will yield.

We will clear this up if you will bear with me a moment. When we get to the appropriating part of this bill the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] can offer a motion to put back $200,000,000 for veterans' relief, if he desires to do it.

Mr. CONNERY. But when we pass this rule now, we practically put into effect everything that was in the economy bill that was passed last session?

Mr. WOODRUM. No, no; the gentleman is mistaken. May I call attention to this—this is where I think we have gotten the wrong impression about it: There were two distinct and separate parts of the economy bill that was passed last year. Title I, or that portion dealing with veterans' relief, and that was permanent legislation. Now, please bear that in mind. We delegated to the President of the United States authority to readjust payments to veterans and issue regulations thereon, which said regulations, when promulgated, have the effect of basic law. So it is not necessary now to reenact any portions of the economy bill passed last year which have to do with cuts in payments to veterans, and they are not involved in the reenacted sections of this bill. The only sections here involved are those sections having to do with pay cuts and automatic promotions and other matters entirely separate and apart from veterans, with two exceptions—the cut for Civil War veterans and the cut on pensions paid by private bills.

Mr. CONNERY. But we continue the veterans' situation as it was under the economy bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. We do not continue it by this rule. It is continued anyway.

Mr. CONNERY. But we stop any opportunity in this appropriation bill to get back the benefits which the veterans lost in that economy bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, no; we do not stop it at all.

Mr. CONNERY. Then, why the rule?

Mr. WOODRUM. Let me reiterate this, please: The cut in employees' salaries was a temporary 1-year cut. Therefore, unless we reenact that legislation for the next fiscal year the authority of the President to make that cut expires on July 1. This appropriation bill would have to carry 100 percent for the salaries; but the cut pertaining to veterans was basic law, and we do not have to reenact it.

Mr. CONNERY. All right. Now, will the gentleman tell me, in this appropriation bill, how we could get back the benefits for the veterans? Suppose I should make a motion to raise the amount from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000, how can we get the money for the veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. You can raise the amount from $250,000,000 to $400,000,000, but you cannot by legislation on an appropriation bill, change the basic law.

Mr. CONNERY. That is why I say we should vote down the rule and get this thing discussed right.

Mr. WOODRUM. But this rule does not affect that. The rule has nothing to do with that.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes, it has. It gags you any way you look at it.

Mr. WOODRUM. If the rule were not here at all and we came down to the section of this bill relating to veterans and the gentleman from Massachusetts got up and offered a motion to pay Spanish-American War veterans $60 a month, the motion would be out of order because it would be legislation on an appropriation bill; but the gentleman could provide $100,000,000 for pension payments, and that would be in order, entirely separate and apart from this rule.

Mr. CONNERY. That would lie dormant and nothing could be done about it unless the economy bill were changed.

Mr. WOODRUM. You can do that under this rule, if it is adopted.

Mr. CONNERY. Does the gentleman mean we can change the economy bill?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. This has nothing to do with the portions of the economy bill relating to veterans.

Mr. CONNERY. But I say that money would lie dormant and nothing would be done unless you repealed the economy bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question for information?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Assuming that this Congress should, before it adjourns, enact legislation that would modify the basic law with regard to benefits for veterans, nowhere, by any appropriation bill, can we get the money to pay the amounts created by such basic law if we cannot offer an amendment to any subsequent appropriation bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. This will be the situation: The rule prevents any deviation from the economy bill, but it does not hit the veterans at all. I will have to answer the gentleman by saying what I said to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], that we have not precluded any veterans' relief by the passage of this rule.

Mr. McSWAIN. But assume that this Congress should pass some remedial legislation to correct injustices that everybody under the sun admits exist, where will we get the money to pay them?

Mr. WOODRUM. Appropriate it. There is nothing to stop it.

Mr. O'MALLEY. But you cannot get it under this rule unless it comes from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. It says any amendment to any appropriation bill from now on is out of order, unless offered by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; it does not say anything of the kind.

It says:

> Any amendment to any appropriation bill in conflict with those sections therein enumerated—

Which have to do with salaries, not veterans' payments.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. I understand from the gentleman's explanation that under the veterans' section you could appropriate $200,000,000 more, or any amount you wanted to, but it would serve no practical purpose because you could not legislate as to how the additional appropriation should be used. Is this correct?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct, and may I follow the gentleman up and say there is nothing whatever to prevent Congress at any time, if it is so advised, by legislation to change the basic law with reference to that or any portion of the economy bill.

Mr. HEALEY. But by increasing the appropriation you would not be doing the veterans' cause any good.

Mr. WOODRUM. Not a bit.

Mr. HEALEY. Because you cannot direct how it shall be used.

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to this provision of the rule:

> Amendments shall not be in order to any other section of the bill H.R. 6663 or to any section of any general appropriation bill of the Seventy-third Congress which would be in conflict with the provisions of title II of the bill H.R. 6663 as reported to the House, except amendments offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, and said amendments shall be in order, any rule of the House to the contrary notwithstanding.

This is my question: Let us say we pass a bill to repeal the Economy Act; we get to the door of the Treasury; we are trying to pay these boys something; but if this rule is adopted, what good will it be to pass in the future a bill amending the Economy Act if you are going to nail the lid on and let the Appropriations Committee control the situation?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think the gentleman has asked a very fair and a very important question. There is not any doubt about the fact that if you pass this rule you close the door insofar as those sections of the Economy Act are concerned, unless and until the Congress shall repeal or modify the Economy Act, but there are no sections in here involved with reference to veterans. Now, why the necessity to make this rule apply to succeeding appropriation bills?

We must have some uniform policy with reference to appropriations. You do not want the independent offices bill to carry a restoration to 90 percent and the Interior Department bill to carry a restoration to 100 percent, and some other bill to carry some other percent. This rule is necessary for the purpose of establishing conclusively that you are going to back the President in his proposal to give back 5 percent to the employees July 1, and then have the right to reinstate so much of the remaining 10 percent in the next fiscal year as the cost of living may justify. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, this rule is the most vicious thing I have seen in my short service in the House. To my mind it is a challenge to any man or woman in this House claiming to have a mind of his or her own. It is an insult to the Membership of this House, and particularly to the membership of the majority party.

Leaders of the majority party, and particularly the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], said he was not worried about the attitude of the majority Members. Apparently he feels, according to that statement—and he as much as says so—that he has you under control. Were I a member of the majority party, I would resent very much such an inference. I believe, however, that any man or woman who votes for this rule is admitting that he or she is under the direct control of the leaders; and I do not believe this should be the attitude of, or that it is even the privilege of, Members of Congress sent here to represent their constituencies. I do not believe they have the right, even if they choose to do so, to surrender their prerogatives as Members of Congress. I do not believe they have the right under the Constitution of the United States, under our theory of government, to surrender to the Appropriations Committee, or to any individual or group of individuals, the control of their votes. I believe every liberal-minded man and woman in this House will from the bottom of his or her heart resent any such gag rule as that proposed here this afternoon. I hope a sufficient number of Members on the Democratic side of the House will join with us on the other side to vote down this rule. The Democrats have a majority of over 200. Certainly this should give them a large enough majority to pass such legislation as their leaders might want without putting the gag rule into effect.

It seems to me that to presume to bring in such a rule as this is tantamount to saying they do not trust their own Members to vote according to the dictates of their consciences. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING].

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Speaker, if we are opposed to limiting restoration of the pay of Federal employees to the 5 percent the President proposes, we are justified in opposing this rule; but I do not concede that anyone is justified in opposing it on the ground that it will bar them from appropriating for the relief of veterans in response to any legislation that may be passed this session. In other words, it does not affect that.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWNING. I cannot yield. I am sorry.

Mr. McFARLANE. I want to clear up a matter.

Mr. BROWNING. I am quite clear. The gentleman is the only one who is muddy.

The only question involved is whether you want now to lay down a uniform rule for the session with regard to the question of increased pay for Federal employees or whether you want this question to come up on every appropriation bill and in different amounts for each department of the Government.

Veterans' legislation is not affected. Even if it were covered, even granting for the sake of argument that veterans' legislation were included, the Appropriations Committee would be obligated to make any appropriation the House may direct them to make from now to the end of the session; and I believe the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will stand up and tell you so, if you ask him. I thing everybody recognizes this to be the rule. If any part of the veterans' program is covered by the rule, the Appropriations Committee will be bound to make the appropriation under this rule for any added benefits. Furthermore, if the House defies the Economy Act and restores some of the veterans' benefits taken from them last session, the Committee on Appropriations will be glad to follow the mandate, and we need have no concern about it now.

This is just a plain question of the amount of increase that we want to vote for Federal employees, and the veterans' compensation is not in it at all. Do not confuse the issue. There is no way of getting it in here. The matter is entirely plain that veterans' increases made by direct legislation can be covered by the Appropriations Committee under this rule and will be. They are commanded to do it. I will ask the Chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. BUCHANAN] if it is not a fact that his committee recognizes, and will recognize, the obligation to bring in an appropriation for any authorization made for veterans in this session of Congress?

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the legislative Committee on Veterans' Affairs, or any other committee, brings in a bill which passes the House and becomes a law authorizing an appropriation for the veterans, or anything else, I, as Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, would feel it my bounden duty to report back to this House for action an appropriation bill carrying out the mandate of Congress as expressed in the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. And that completely answers the inquiry I made of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I have not the time to go in detail into the effect of this legislation, but if there was a mirror right in front of you gentlemen the answer would be there. I wish you could just see your own expressions. You look terribly worried. You know perfectly well that besides stifling your voice this gag rule is contrary to your true conscience and is un-American. And you will be deliberately gagging yourselves. I would have a good deal of pity for you if you were not able-bodied men, but you are able-bodied men. You can get up here on the floor of the House and fight, and fight hard, but when regulations concerning the veterans were rewritten, in effect they gagged disabled men and women and elderly widows. Those men and women were bound hand and foot by administration regulations and thrown into the river, so to speak, and told to swim for their compensation.

Why did I have a man in my office in Washington all summer to help the veterans with their cases? They were sick mentally and physically. They were not able to fight. Why did I have a man in my office in Lowell in order to help the veteran men and women in my district? They were disabled. There were widows and children. They did not have a chance to fight for themselves. They did not understand the law. They were bewildered and living in fear of the future. They did not understand the regulations. They did not know how to present their claims. They could not secure a sufficiently long hearing of their claims without the assistance of a Member of Congress, or his or her representative. This was necessary in order that even just a little time might be given to the presentation of their claims. It was really pathetic. You know how rapidly those claims were settled or were not settled at all. Do you realize there are 24,000 forms filed by Spanish War veterans for a review on appeal now pending before the Bureau? You know that the boards did not have time to decide the merits of these cases as they were told that the cases must be finished at a very early date. Many cases should be reviewed again. You and I know that the doubt always had to be resolved in favor of the Government and not in favor of the veteran. In other words, the veteran had to prove his case. That is why I have extra people in my office to assist me. There are so many veterans I cannot help them all by myself.

Why bind yourselves to keep quiet so far as the Federal employees are concerned? Take the substitute carriers in our various post offices, for instance. Do you know that I have been told that the average pay of the substitute carrier is $1 a day? Think of it—$1 a day! And those substitute carriers have to report at 7 o'clock in the morning and must not leave until 12 o'clock noon and be available all during the day. How can they earn money any other way? That is the plight of some of our postal carriers. You know how greatly overworked the regular letter carriers are as a result of the Economy Act and its effect in the Postal Department. You also know that business firms are not able to have their business carried on satisfactorily because they do not have the late evening mail collections. This is also due to the economy program. If those collections could be made, it would mean work for the substitute carriers. The business of the country could be carried on much better. You know the number of men who are actually sick or practically sick on duty carrying mail, particularly in the very severe climates, because their work has been so arduous. It has been cold in New England this winter with a lot of snow. You can appreciate the hardship that has been endured there by these men.

You men and women have strength. You have strength to fight for what you want. You know very well that you do not want to vote to gag yourselves, not only for today or for future appropriation bills. You know you do not. Please vote against this rule. I urge you to assert your manhood and your womanhood. How can you go back to the people of your district and face your veterans, your Federal employees? How can the gentleman from Texas, for instance, talk to his veterans?

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentlewoman from Massachusetts yield?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentlewoman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentlewoman from Massachusetts state that she has never voted for a gag rule when the Republicans were in the majority?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. No. I never voted for such a rule as is proposed today.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentlewoman has voted for a lot of gag rules.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman is going to bring up the party feature, I will ask the gentleman if he does not realize that the greatest benefits to our veterans accrued under the Republican administration? That is equally true of the benefits accrued to the Federal employees.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I did not feel it necessary to speak on the question of the rule until the last remark of the charming lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS] compelled me to take the floor. She had the audacity to state that benefits to the veterans of the United States happened—and that is the appropriate word—under a Republican administration. Why, any benefits to any veterans occurred after two thirds of every vote cast for the benefit of the veterans came from this Democratic side of the House. Every benefit for the veterans had to be dragged out of the Republican administrations since Harding. When the veterans shall erect a monument to their champion down here on the Mall, it will never be to a Harding, to a Coolidge, to a Hoover, or to a Snell. It will be erected to the credit of somebody like WRIGHT PATMAN or GORDON BROWNING or "BILL" CONNERY, who sit on this Democratic side of the House, and not on the Republican side of the House. [Applause.]

When labor and the working people of our Nation shall erect a monument to its champions, no Republican individual—yea, not even that old G.O.P. elephant—will sit upon the pedestal of that monument, because in every State in this Union and in this National Legislature, labor, the veteran, and the working man and woman of this Nation have only wrung from the Republican Party, happening to be in power at the time, anything they ever got for their benefit, and then only by the majority support of the Democratic Party.

Now, I intend as to this measure to continue to support the President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt. I do so out of no "abject surrender" or in the nature of a "rubber stamp", as the "cooperating" politics-playing Republicans would say. The minority is playing politics. One hundred and fifteen men on the Republican side of this House propose to vote as a unit against this rule, not from their hearts but in an attempt to scuttle the administration by cajoling possibly 75 Members on the Democratic side of the House to blindly go along with them. I feel confident, however, there are not anywhere near 75 Democratic Members who will fall into that political trap.

Imagine the Republicans championing the cause of the Federal employees. Since when? God save the mark. Since when have these Philadelphia and Pittsburgh Republicans become the champions of the working man? [Laughter.] Since when has the G.O.P. been the champion of the veteran?

I propose to go along with the President because I know he is right. That is why I have been consistently going along with him—because he has been right in every instance, and 99 percent of our people endorse everything he has done.

As to Federal salaries and the cost of living, the President had the facts before him. The President had exact information that the average wage of the man in private industry has been reduced from 20 to 50 percent since 1928. Why, I have hundreds of men and women in my district in New York City who have been cut 100 percent, not 15, because they have walked the streets of my city for 2 or 3 years without any wages. They would gladly have taken a 15-percent cut.

It is only because of the increased cost of living in the District of Columbia, alone of all the country, of a little less than 15 percent less than 1928 that the President arrived at this gratuitous gift of a 5-percent increase to the Federal employees. Throughout the country the cost of living is still 21 percent plus less than in 1928.

Mr. Speaker, if there are any real champions of the Federal employees, they sit on this Democratic side of the House where they have always sat and not on the Republican, which caters at times to our governmental employees merely for political purposes.

If we here are to support the President, this is our first opportunity in this regular session of the Seventy-third Congress. I propose to go along with him because he is going along with me. I agree with him. I know he is right and that is why I am with him today. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN].

Mr. MCGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, let us call the roll, based upon the truth of what Republican Presidents did pertaining to veterans' legislation. Mr. Harding vetoed the bonus. Mr. Coolidge vetoed the bonus. Mr. Hoover vetoed the advance payment of the first half of the bonus. So far the statements of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] are correct, but no further.

Mr. Hoover's message to the last Congress while he was President called upon Congress for some economy in veterans' expenditures, but he did not ask to take one single penny away from any veteran suffering from actual or presumptive service-connected disability. Mr. Hoover's message did not ask to take one penny away from a Spanish War veteran. Mr. Hoover's last message to the Congress would fit in perfectly with the American Legion program today, and the veterans of this country would ask no greater blessing from the hand of the Government than to have from this Government a program in perfect harmony with the last message sent to this Congress upon veterans' legislation by Mr. Hoover, a Republican President. [Applause.]

Now, coming down to this bill, there would only be one way that any relief could be given to veterans, and that would be upon page 27, where we might increase the total amount of the appropriation for pensions, but no further could we go.

If an amendment were offered increasing the appropriation and specifying so much for service-connected disability of World War veterans and so much for Spanish War veterans, we would be confronted with the proposition that it was adding legislation to this bill, and there we would be blocked by those in control of the House. Then pass this rule on top of that and you cannot touch veterans' legislation at any place in the bill.

I stood for the economy bill when it passed this House. I stood for it in keeping with the President's pledge that he would deal fairly and justly in this mattter, and I had a right to believe that fair and just consideration would not take one penny away from any service-connected disabled World War veteran, actual or presumptive. [Applause.]

Even the Economy League, with all its harshness, never asked to take money away from service-connected disabled World War veterans; and today what this country is wanting us to do is to restore the last penny of pension benefits to World War service-connected disabled veterans, whether the service connection is actual or presumptive, and to deal fairly and squarely with the Spanish War veterans, which means giving them additional pensions in a most substantial amount. [Applause.]

I am not afraid to meet the issue, and I am willing to meet it now. I do not need this gag rule to prohibit me from doing anything, lest I might not have the courage to do fairly as between the taxpayer on the one side and the veterans and public employees on the other side. Let us vote down this gag rule and legislate as honest legislators should legislate. If we vote it down, I will have the courage to vote against many demands which may be made by veterans and employees, but at the same time I should be glad to vote for some concessions which are rightfully due veterans and employees. I want the opportunity for this Congress to do the square thing by all the Spanish War veterans and by the World War veterans with service-connected disabilities, actual and presumptive. That has not been done under present regulations. The Economy Act as passed by the Congress has been ignored by the executive branch of this Government in dealing with Spanish War veterans, because that act provided that the presumption would be that the disabilities of Spanish War veterans were service connected. The executive department has given no fair regard to the provision that the disabilities of Spanish War veterans would be presumed to be service connected and that the burden would be upon the Government to prove that the disabilities were not service connected rather than upon the Spanish War veterans to prove that they were service connected. Likewise, in the case of World War veterans with service-connected disabilities, actual and presumptive, the executive department has not kept faith with the Congress or the country. Neither Congress nor the country expected compensation for these service-connected disabilities of World War veterans to be reduced by either reclassification of disabilities or percentage reduction. [Applause.] I thank you.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time remains on this side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. THOMASON). The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has 23½ minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania 32 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, this is a large question upon which we are now engaged but it seems to me that there is a still larger one which has not been touched upon today. Everywhere throughout the world parliamentary government is on trial. Parliamentary government has failed in Germany, parliamentary government has failed in Italy, parliamentary government has failed over a large portion of the continent of Europe and throughout South America.

Parliamentary government in the United States is on trial today as it has never been before in the history of our country.

Bill after bill has come before us during the Seventy-third Congress. Bill after bill has come up and has been passed virtually without debate, undigested and not understood by the membership of the House.

Now we are called upon to pass a rule which takes away from the membership virtually the last vestige of right and power for which our forefathers have struggled for a thousand years.

I was one who voted against the economy bill, not so much on the question of veterans' compensation, but because I believed the membership did not understand the implications of the bill; they did not realize the results that might come from it.

I will vote against this rule more cheerfully than I voted against the economy bill last spring. The rule has been but briefly discussed, and not a Member in the House can realize its implications. It seems to me that if the members of the great Democratic Party, for which I have the utmost respect—it seems to me that if they want to live up to the principles of Thomas Jefferson, Andrew Jackson, Grover Cleveland, and Woodrow Wilson, they have a chance today to strike a real blow for the continuation of parliamentary government in the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HOEPPEL].

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, about a year ago events occurred in Germany which we are endeavoring to duplicate here today. We are trying to Hitlerize the American Congress. [Applause.]

I am opposed to the gag rule, I am opposed to the leadership on my side of the House that denies the membership the right to speak in reference to the rule unless they know that the man is manacled and bound like a serf or slave. [Applause.]

What right have we as Representatives to come here to represent our constituents when our own leadership holds us in subjection and will not permit us to speak in accordance with the wishes of our constituents? That is not what our party stands for, and I resent it.

I call attention to another feature. You are denying to our Federal employees a just restoration of wages. Yet "Crack-Down Windy" Johnson favored his stenographer and raised her pay from $100 a month to $500 a month. That is what "Crack-Down" did. Every one of these patronage departments which we created in the last session is filled to overflowing with surplus men, men who are receiving large salaries, many whom I personally know to be incompetent, but they probably supported the party and must be paid fabulous salaries at the expense of the regular civil-service employee.

Our President asks us now to withhold from the Federal employees the just wage to which they are entitled. I wrote to the President and I also wrote to the Secretary of the Treasury and stated that by the failure to refund the $6,238,000,000 of liberty loans we are actually paying more into the hands of the American bankers than we are proposing to restore here to the Federal employees.

Not only that, but the President yesterday requested validation of the principle of additional billions of tax-exempt bonds under the Federal Land Act, thus adding to the farmer's burden while he creates smiles for the coupon clippers of Wall Street. Every man who votes for this rule, from my point of view, is voting to cast himself into slavery. We might just as well go home and turn the entire operation of the Congress over to the "brain trust." I believe that it would be more economical to do so. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] to interrogate the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM].

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the gentleman's statement of the effect of this rule upon veterans' legislation. I am satisfied now that we can remedy injustices done to service-connected veterans and Spanish War veterans, but I want also to ask him if it does prevent the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments from affecting the hours of pay and the condition of the substitutes in the Post Office Department? It does not, in my opinion.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not understand that it affects anything but the rate of pay which was provided in the Economy Act. It does perpetuate that; but, as I understand it, it does not prevent in any way the Post Office Committee from bringing in legislation affecting the hours or working conditions or anything of that kind.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, if we wish to consider a bill to lessen the hours of labor, to spread the available work, and therefore to give some substitutes a chance, it would simply affect the rate of pay, and we could still give them an increase in hours of work and thus an increase in pay received for such hours?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is correct.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the main question which by our vote we are to solve today is whether the influence of the President of the United States, as our Commander in Chief, speaking for all the 120,000,000 Americans in this terrible war now existing, affects us more than do the commands made upon us today by the leaders of the organized 850,000 employees of this Government, aided and abetted by William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor.

It is a question of who is our leader. It is a question of whom we will follow. It is a question of whose commands we will take in this crucial period. It is a question of whether we will put the interests of the whole people of the United States above the selfish interests of the employees of our Government. It is a question of whether we will let these employees dictate to us. It is a question of whether we will be rubber stamps for these organizations of Government employees or whether we will back our President in his unselfish plans for the recovery of our whole Nation.

By passing the President's Economy Act, Public No. 2, in the last session, salaries of all Government employees were cut 15 percent. But the cut was only for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934. Unless legislation is now passed that affects all of the 10 supply bills for all of the 10 departments of Government and the independent offices, all of the basic salaries will be restored for the new fiscal year beginning July 1, 1934, and there would be no salary cuts after that date. To prevent a restoration of all of the old salaries legislation must be passed.

The President has sent us his message, clear-cut and easily understood, that the Government cannot afford to restore these cuts dating back to last January 1, as demanded by the various organizations of Government employees, but that he is willing on next July 1, for the next fiscal year, to restore a third of the cut, so that such cut will be only 10 instead of 15 percent, and the President has asked us Democrats to support him in his plan.

And to put the plan of the President into execution and to carry out his financial policy it was necessary for the question to be decided once for all with respect to all employees, so in this first appropriation bill the legislation proposed by the President was made a part of it. But it being legislation, a point of order made by any Member, without a rule making it in order, would be sustained, knocking out of the bill this legislation; hence to keep it in the bill, it was necessary for this rule to be brought here and passed so that no point of order could eliminate it.

Naturally, such a rule must be iron-clad. Naturally, it must prevent amendments. If the program were amended, it would not be the President's program. If his necessary legislation were changed, it would not be what he wants. Were it open to amendment, do you not know that the diverse views of 435 Members of this House would change it so that it would not be what the President needs?

To us who have been here for many years, the antics of our friends across the aisle—the Republicans—are quite amusing. When we remember the autocratic domination of this House by Chairman Phil Campbell, and some of the gag rules he put over, this rule now before us seems liberal. When we remember some of the rules that gagged, hog-tied, blindfolded, and made Democrats speechless that were passed in this House by Chairman SNELL during Republican regime, we feel that there is ample precedent for almost any kind of party teamwork in this House.

For the benefit of some of our new colleagues, I want to remind them of one of the last gagging performances of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], then chairman of the Rules Committee. In the second session of the Seventy-first Congress, in April 1930, what was known as the "Rankin bill", for the relief of World War veterans, being bill H.R. 10381, was passed by this House. It was the only bill of that kind that was ever considered here under the general rules of this body. It was known as the most general and liberal bill to veterans that has ever been reported here. It was largely the work of our beloved and distinguished colleague from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]. It was debated for days. It was considered and read under the general rules, open to all germane amendments.

It was amended repeatedly from the floor. Every Member had the right to offer his amendments and be heard on same and to have a vote on same. This bill passed this House on April 24, 1930, by a record vote of 324 for it and only 49 votes against it. You will find the roll call on page 7673 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for April 24, 1930. Remember only 49 Members voted against its final passage. Such prominent Republicans as Mr. Cooper of Ohio; Mr. Darrow, of Pennsylvania; Mr. Fish, of New York; Mr. Frear, of Wisconsin; Mr. Gibson, of Vermont, who is now a Senator; Mr. Haugen; Mr. Hawley; Mr. Hooper; Mrs. Kahn; our good friend Clyde Kelly; Mr. Mapes, the present great minority leader of this House; Mr. Snell, who is now controlling you Republicans; Mr. Stalker; Mr. Treadway; and many of your other prominent Republicans voted for the bill and helped to pass it. They must have thought it was a good bill, or they would not have voted for it. As I said before, only 49 Members saw fit to vote against it, and then it went to the Senate.

The Senate debated it at length. The Senate passed this bill by a vote of 66 Senators for it and only 6 against it. Only six Senators thought that it was a bad bill. It was a 10-to-1 majority in the Senate. If you will look on page 11496 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 23, 1930, you will find the record vote by roll call of the Senate. The Senate amended the bill in many particulars, making it far more generous and liberal to the veterans than even the House bill was; and when the bill came back to the House, all of the Senate amendments were adopted by the House without a dissenting vote. You will find this action on page 11694 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 25, 1930. And the bill then went to the White House for the President's approval. It was Mr. Herbert Hoover, the Republican President, who was to pass on it. He promptly vetoed it and sent it back to Congress to die, unless both Houses could pass it by a two-thirds vote.

Then you saw Republicans turn tail, and right about. Then you saw them turn somersaults. Then you saw them become rubber stamps. Then you saw Mr. Republican Leader SNELL, of New York—who had voted for the bill on April 24, 1930, and who had let it as amended again pass the House on June 25, 1930, the last time without a dissenting voice raised against it—listen to the voice of his Commander in Chief in the White House and vote to kill it. And it was killed by Republican votes. Who were rubber stamps then? Whose master's voice controlled then? Who listened then to the White House? Who then obeyed? It was the Republican bellwethers of this House.

But now we come to the gag rule. On that eventful day, June 26, 1930, knowing just what kind of a measure President Hoover wanted, as soon as the House met, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] called up one of his rules, and passed it, and it was the prince of gag rules:

Resolved, That it shall be in order, beginning on Thursday, June 26, 1930, until the end of the present session of Congress, for the Speaker to recognize Members for motions to suspend the rules.

And it was passed. Do you know what that rule meant? Any Member who was thereafter recognized by the Speaker could pull out of his pocket a bill, large or small, 10 pages or 200 pages, written or printed, even though not another Member may have seen it, when it had been before no committee, and pass it with only 20 minutes of debate to the side, and when no Member would have the right to offer an amendment, or a motion to recommit, or change it in any particular. I immediately asked him the following questions:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SNELL. Yes.
Mr. BLANTON. I understand the proposed new veterans' legislation will be brought up in such shape that you cannot change it by dotting an "i" or crossing a "t." Is that the plan?
Mr. SNELL. That is the plan.

Then our present great Democratic Chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. POU] made the following observation (see p. 11824):

It may be under gag rule you will put through some substitute; but there will be an accounting day, and that day will be in the coming November.

And there was then called up a bill that no Democrat had even seen—one that had been approved and sent here by President Hoover from the White House—and it was passed under suspension of all rules, with only 20 minutes of debate to the side, and with no amendments whatever allowed, and with no motion to recommit of any kind allowed, and that was done under Snell regime.

It was all right for Republican Mr. SNELL, on June 26, 1930, to pass gag legislation from Republican Mr. Hoover, sent from the White House, but it is all wrong for Democratic Mr. BYRNS, on January 11, 1934, to pass a Democratic program sent here from a Democratic White House for the recovery of the United States.

This attempt here today to override President Franklin D. Roosevelt in his economy program was started months ago by the organizations of Government employees. When one of their presidents tried to get me in vacation to pledge my vote to go against the President, he said I was the only one, then, who had refused to thus pledge him. The following is the letter I wrote to him:

ABILENE, TEX., November 4, 1933.

Hon. E. CLAUDE BABCOCK,
National President American Federation of Government Employees,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BABCOCK: I have your letter, and will gladly answer your questions. You stated in the Washington Star that 25 Congressmen have pledged their vote to restore cuts in salaries of Government employees, I being the only one to oppose your plan. I note that the News there suggests organizing against me, by playing up the small salaries before the public. Washington papers don't like me. I stop raids.

You certainly remember that in the last Congress I fought against cutting the small salaries, but sought to cut to the bone all of the larger salaries. They must be reduced. You say, "We desire to ascertain the source of the information on which you base your assertion that Government employees draw from $3,000 to $10,000 per year." You surely will not deny such facts.

Look on page 3624 of the daily RECORD for February 8, 1932. The authentic official data there show that, excluding the $75,000 President's salary, those of the Supreme Court justices, Cabinet officers, ministers to foreign countries, and the $8,500-per-year salaries now paid Senators and Congressmen, this Government then had 32 employees drawing over $15,000, 41 employees drawing $12,000, 6 employees drawing $11,000, 134 employees drawing $10.000, 138 employees drawing $9,000, 40 employees drawing $8,500, 244 employees drawing $7,000, 309 employees drawing $6,500, 1,943 employees drawing $6,000, 442 employees drawing $5,800, 1,324 employees drawing $5,600, 314 employees drawing $5,400, 510 employees drawing $5,200, 1,602 employees drawing $5,000, 2,034 employees drawing $4,800, 2,605 employees drawing $4,600, 1,714 employees drawing $4,400, 1,535 employees drawing $4,200, 154 employees drawing $4,100, 2,371 employees drawing $4,000, 1,489 employees drawing $3,900, 2,954 employees drawing $3,800, 1,602 employees drawing $3,700, 3,196 employees drawing $3,600, 2,105 employees drawing $3,500, 2,019 employees drawing $3,400, 2,749 employees drawing $3,300, 4,613 employees drawing $3,200, 2,011 employees drawing $3,100, 4,191 employees drawing $3,000, 4,263 employees drawing $2,900, 9,425 employees drawing $2,800, 8,177 employees drawing $2,700, 15,567 employees drawing $2,600, 49,291 employees drawing $2,500, 23,293 employees drawing $2,400, 26,268 employees drawing $2,300, 16,384 employees drawing $2,200, and 118,759 employees drawing $2,100 each per annum. Isn't that a pretty good bunch?

Most of them had all 52 Sundays off, all of the many holidays off, including half of Saturdays, 30 days' vacation on full pay, 30 days' sick leave on full pay, comfortable working environments, many drawing large travel allowances, and retired on pay after 30 years.

Government employees constitute the favored few. They are entitled to the same consideration shown other citizens, no more, no less. They have no political campaigns, pay out nothing to hold their jobs, and are not beset continuously with demands for contributions to this and that which Congressmen must endure. Yet many draw better pay than some Governors. In 1 State the Governor draws only $3,000, in 3 States only $4,000, and in 2 States $4,500.

It costs the Government $13,000 to put each cadet through either West Point or Annapolis. In the RECORD of April 8, 1932, I showed that able-bodied generals and admirals are retiring as young as 45, and commercializing their Government training by drawing huge salaries from corporations, while also drawing retired pay for life from the Government. I mentioned Gen. James G. Harbord, on retired pay, and for years drawing a salary of $50,000 per year from the Radio Corporation of America. His prestige and chance to get Army and Navy contracts does it. I also mentioned Gen. Herbert B. Crosby, then drawing $6,000 retired pay, and $9,000 salary as Commissioner; Gen. Mason M. Patrick then drawing $6,000 retired pay, and a salary of $7,500 as utility head; Gen. Pelham D. Glassford then drawing $4,312.44 retired pay and $8,000 salary as police major, which situation since then has been changed, and I gave an extended list of lawyers and doctors in one bureau drawing large retired pay and also large annual salaries. I showed in the RECORD of April 21, 1932, that one bureau had 876 lawyers, some of whom, through the workings of your Employees' Classification Board, had had their salaries raised from $1,500 to $8,000 per annum. The Classification Act of 1923, which raised many $1,500 salaries to $5,000, $6,000, and $7,500, was put over by just such pledges as you are now exacting from Congressmen in vacation.

You entered civil-service employment 10 years ago at a salary of $1,100, while as secretary of the civil service the Government was paying you last August $5,600 per annum.

American taxpayers are tired of standing the tremendous overhead of Government expense—national, State, county, and city. They demand reductions. If you will send me a list of all your members who are dissatisfied with their Government pay and are willing to give up their positions, I will furnish from my district 500 qualified applicants for each position, who will gladly take the job at a lower salary. You had better let well enough alone. The people are waking up. They want pledges made to them and not to selfish groups. They want their new deal continued. They are backing the President 100 percent in reducing expenditures.

Very sincerely,

THOMAS L. BLANTON.

And, because I refused in advance to pledge my vote to the employees against the President's recovery program, all of the magazines of these employees have been attacking me and misrepresenting me. You have probably noticed attacks in the papers here recently against me. The inspiration came partly because of my refusal to thus pledge my vote.

We have all received the urgent demands from the rural letter carriers associations. We have all received the demands from the city letter carriers. Today we all received the 35-page printed brief and argument from the National Association of Letter Carriers, and the strong written appeal from Hon. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, with which many Government employees are affiliated, and the strong appeal from Mr. E. Claude Babcock, national president of the American Federation of Government Employees, and from Mr. James L. Keeley, National Federation of Post Office Motor Vehicle Employees, and from Mr. Charles E. Gibson, National Association of Post Office Laborers, and from Mr. John J. Barrett, United National Association of Post Office Clerks, and from Mr. Luther C. Steward, National Federation of Federal Employees, and from Mr. W. G. Armstrong, National Rural Letter Carriers Association, and from Mr. J. J. Fields, National Association of Postal Supervisors.

What effect is it going to have on all of us? Are we going to obey them? Are they our masters? Are we taking orders from them? Are they more influential in controlling our vote here than is the interest of the whole 120,000,000 people of the United States? Remember that when we vote against this rule we are restoring all of the basic salaries as they existed before the Economy Act was passed. If we vote "no", and against this rule, we would be voting to restore our own salaries to $10,000 beginning with July 1, 1934. Are you willing to do that, when millions of men are still without jobs? I am going to support the President. I am going to carry out his recovery program. I am going to vote for the previous question, and I am going to vote for the rule.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, during my 19 years' service in Congress I have always hesitated to pledge myself to legislation before the convening of Congress, but I made an exception this fall and told the Government employees that I would vote to restore the 15-percent wage reduction. I also spoke to American Legion posts and informed them that I would support the American Legion four-point program, for I believe it is fair and conservative. But today I find myself in this position, and it is very humiliating to me: I expected and supposed that when these questions came before Congress I was going to have an opportunity, through a record, roll-call vote, to express myself by voting on the question of the restoration of the 15-percent wage reduction. But I find myself—and as I say, it is very humiliating to me—in the position where I am not going to be permitted, as the Representative of a sovereign people, to express myself on a vote on this important question before us today.

I believe the 15-percent pay cut should be restored. During the special session of Congress last spring Congress passed the Economy Act, which was for the express purpose of balancing the Budget, a great many of us voted for reason we wanted to balance the Budget and keep the Government expenditures within our income, but the Budget has not been balanced. However, hundreds of millions of dollars—yes, running up into the billions—have been found spent in governmental activities of many kinds. I recognize it was necessary to have the Federal Government provide relief for those who were unemployed and in distress, and I am not opposed to the Federal Government's furnishing relief to the needy people of our country, but under the N.R.A. there was a system of codes established regulating the hours of labor, setting minimum wages, and fixing maximum hours of labor. Under the N.R.A. codes, any man who is classified as a skilled worker today who is now working under the C.W.A. relief program gets $1.20 an hour. This situation was brought to my attention just a few days ago. I was sitting in my office at home when a contractor who was constructing a large church in my home city of Youngstown, Ohio, came in and said to me, "COOPER, I am in trouble and I have come to see if you can help me." I said, "What is the matter?" He said, "You know I have the contract to construct a large church, and I am being held up. I cannot get stonemasons. I pay the regular union scale of wages, $1.12 per hour for 8 hours' work per day, for which they receive $9." He stated he had "4 stonemasons, but I need 8 more. I have 6 months' work for them." I said "Why can't you get them?" He said, "They have all gone to the C.W.A., where they get $1.20 an hour." I call attention to this matter in order to show that the Government is paying a higher wage to C.W.A. workers than the wage paid in private industry.

The standard of wages fixed under the N.R.A. and increasing production costs certainly has increased the cost of living. I am just as much concerned in increasing the wages of our Government employees as I am those on the outside who are working under the C.W.A., for they must meet increased living costs also.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman from Ohio 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. As I said, I find myself today in the humiliating situation that I will not have an opportunity to express myself in a direct vote on this question by reason of the adoption of a rule which prohibits me from doing so. In other words, I am denied the duty of representing the people of my district.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I would rather not yield just now. I would rather finish first.

A few moments ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] made a bitter attack upon the Republican Party and upon the Republican administrations of the past. I believe I voice the sentiment of every Republican on this side of the House when I say that we are ready and willing at all times to assist President Roosevelt in putting through any constructive program which he has to offer. We have no desire to oppose the present administration in matters of vital interest to our country. Does the gentleman from New York forget? I was here, and there are Members in this Chamber who were here at that time, when we declared war on the Imperial Government of Germany, when we had a Democratic President, and when he asked for legislation to prosecute that war and carry it to a successful conclusion. Was it the Democratic leadership of the House that put that program through? No. The Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Mr. Dent, refused to handle the legislation. The Speaker of the House was not with the President in his program. The Democratic floor leader, Claude Kitchin, a man whom I loved, and his name is revered, he has passed away now, was not with the Democratic President, and it had to fall upon the patriotic Republican membership of this House, led by the Honorable Julius Kahn, the husband of our honored colleague, Mrs. KAHN, from California—Julius Kahn, who was the ranking Republican member of the Committee on Military Affairs; and through his leadership President Wilson's program to prosecute the war was carried out. Today the Republican Party stands ready to do its part and help the President of the United States to bring us out of this terrible situation that we find our country in at this time.

The gentleman from New York criticized the Republican Party's attitude toward labor. I say to you, and it cannot be successfully contradicted, that every constructive piece of legislation in the interest and for the benefit of labor during the last 12 or 14 years has been enacted by a Republican administration and a Republican Congress. [Applause.] I do not forget that my friend Congressman KELLY, a member of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, was the author of a bill that increased the salaries of postal employees $300 a year and placed them on a 44-hour week basis; but now they have had that $300 taken away from them, and some of the privileges which were granted to them under a Republican Congress have been taken away from them also.

The gentleman from New York charges the Republican Party with being the enemy of the laboring classes. If my time would permit, I could call attention to many acts of Congress for the benefit of labor during the last 10 years of Republican Party administration. It was under a Republican administration that the child labor amendment was passed; 22 States have ratified that same. If you will examine the record and see what States have ratified the amendment, you will find that more than three quarters of them are Republican States and not Democratic States. So I say, my friends, after many years' service in this House, it is with humility that I stand here, as the Representative of a sovereign group of people in my district, and be deprived of the opportunity to express my views on important legislation of this character, on account of the rule which you will adopt for the passage of this legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has consumed all the time allotted to him.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know of anything in particular I could say that would tend to clarify the issue presented by this resolution. I think it rather important, however, toward the close of the debate to reassert, and I do it upon my responsibility as a member of the Committee on Rules, the statement frequently made in this debate by the gentleman from Virginia, the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, and by others, that the adoption of this rule as now presented, affecting as it does, only title II to the pending bill, does not and cannot in any wise affect the rights of any committee of this House having jurisdiction of those matters, either post-office matters, or veterans' matters, to hereafter report legislation to this House for its approval that may change the basic law now in existence with reference to the compensation that is being paid. Let there be no mistake about this. There cannot be any mistake about it.

There is only one issue presented by this rule. I admit it is a so-called "gag rule"; I admit it violates the ordinary procedure of this House. I have many times heretofore discussed the necessity of such rules under our system of party organization as a matter of party policy; so I do not want to rehash those old arguments. It is done by our friends on the Republican side of the House when they are in control, and it will always be done by the party in control as long as we have our present parliamentary system of party government.

The only issue presented here today, therefore, is whether or not this House shall carry out the recommendations of the President of the United States after thoughtful and careful consideration of all the features involved in it; after consideration of the status of the Budget for the regular expenses of the Government; after considering the legitimate and the humane claims, I grant you, of those seeking this increase in their basic compensation.

The essential and vital thing—the only one involved in this proposition—is whether or not you will vote to sustain the President's recommendation to increase the basic pay of all Government employees 5 percent over the present reduction and require them for the next fiscal year to continue a reduction of 10 percent from their basic salaries. This is all that is involved. Notwithstanding all this argument, the veterans' interests are not jeopardized; the jurisdiction of the legislative committees of this House is in nowise imperiled by the passage of this rule.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to say just a word to the Members on my own side of the House.

You can see the solid opposition of these brethren over there. Here is the beginning of a very vital and critical issue with reference to the perpetuation of the policies of the President. When the rule is voted upon I have no doubt there will be a unanimous vote on this side, the Republican side, against this bill. [Applause from the Republican side.] There you are, my Democratic friends!

A few moments ago the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] inadvertently said that in the last session his side came very near slipping up on us two or three times. They will whittle down, if they can, the solidarity and compactness of our party organization here in this House. This is another effort on their part. They will vote solidly against this. They have made appeals to certain Members on the Democratic side who have some particular interest to go along with them; and the ultimate hope of the Republicans is that they will get enough votes to destroy the Democratic organization in this House and to discredit the President of the United States. [Applause.]

I ask every Democrat in this House whether he is going to vote for that kind of an ambush. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD].

Mr. MCLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I arise at this time to discuss a most extraordinary and unprecedented act of a majority party in Congress. It is my belief that one of the most important points of this unique rule has not been called to the attention of this House. Eight or nine general appropriation bills will come before the House during this session of Congress. In any one of these bills the provisions of the Economy Act could be altered or amended under the ordinary rules of the House. This rule we are about to vote on will prevent our future action of approval or disapproval. This will be the most far-reaching gag rule ever adopted. Let me point out at this time that this is the first instance when a Congress has attempted, by a rule, to legislate future parliamentary procedure relative to future appropriation bills.

If you vote for this rule, you will prohibit yourselves from ever, during this session, voting for an amendment or a change or an alteration of any phase of the iniquitous Economy Act. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], whom I consider one of the greatest parliamentarians in the House, cannot deny this statement.

Mr. Speaker, it is unfair. There is an army of at least 600,000 Federal employees who are watching and looking for assistance to this House of Representatives today. If you vote for this rule today, you are assuming far more jurisdiction of the rights of the people of the country than they considered you vested with, waiving their rights for the future. I do not see how you can justify a vote for this rule with your oath of office. I warn you majority Members of the House to take notice of this abuse while there still is time, and vote "no" on the adoption of this rule. [Applause.]

The startling inconsistency of the double policy pursued by the Federal Government in its efforts to bring about national recovery is again brought to the fore today in this independent offices appropriation bill. Hearings on this bill have brought to light the fact that civil-service employees worked 37,359 hours overtime without pay in the fiscal year which ended last June 30 and worked an additional 45,545 overtime hours without pay during July, August, September, and October. This situation was caused by the discharge of about 25,000 Government employees throughout the country and forcing thousands of others into involuntary retirement. During the period these employees were forced to work long hours overtime, every facility the Government could command was being used to increase purchasing power in private industry by providing shorter working hours and higher pay.

The contradictory and contrary policy of excessive overtime work without pay required of Government employees has not been confined to the Civil Service Commission. It has spread to the ranks of the N.R.A. headquarters itself, although the blanket code established a maximum work week of 35 hours in the manufacturing industry and of 40 hours in other work. This inconsistency is heightened by a recent statement credited to an official of the N.R.A. that if the unemployed are to be absorbed, the whole country must eventually come to a shorter working week.

While rates of pay were being increased in private industry under the N.R.A., and billions of dollars being spent on the administration's experiments, the Federal workers have been forced to work overtime without pay and have suffered salary reductions, varying, because of administrative furloughs, of from 15 to about 50 percent. During the time that every encouraging incentive was being offered private employees, the ambition-stifling policy of barring promotions and pay increases has been adopted by the Government.

No accurate figures of the extent of the harm done the country by this double policy of liberality on the one hand and drastic slashing on the other are available. However, it has been conservatively figured that purchasing power of Federal employees in the District of Columbia alone, where they constitute about 40 percent of the buying public, has been reduced by over $20,000,000 annually. It has been estimated that the resultant loss of purchasing power of proprietors and employees of Washington establishments has brought the total loss of consuming capacity in the District of Columbia to at least $40,000,000 annually. The harmful and retrogressive effects of the Federal pay slash have, of course, extended in proportion throughout the entire Nation. This course is especially regrettable when we consider that the total sum paid Federal employees constitutes but 4 percent of the citizen's tax dollar, so that if all Government salaries were entirely eliminated the Nation's expenses would remain practically the same.

More than one sixth of civilian Federal employees receive less than $1,000 yearly. The total number of Federal employees is approximately 600,000.

Vast sums have been and will continue to be expended in the present program. Six billion dollars has been loaned by the R.F.C. from February 2, 1932, to December 31, 1933. Gross farm income for 1933 is estimated at six and one third billions, a 25-percent increase over 1932. Of this figure about $300,000,000 will represent money paid by the Government from processing taxes. The last 9 months of 1933 saw the prices of farm products increase 45 percent, to a figure averaging 71 percent of pre-war prices.

Factory employees in June 1933 received an average of 41.8 cents per hour, 27.2 percent lower than the 1929 average of 57.4 cents per hour. From June to last October wage rates showed an increase of 25.6 percent. October rates amounted to 52.5 cents per hour, only 8.5 percent less than in 1929. Can you call this consistency?

With all the vast machinery of our Government it has in whole signally failed to take into consideration the fact that maintenance of an adequate standard of pay and hours of labor for Government employees is an essential prerequisite to recovery.

The present method of determining the rate of pay of Federal workers, by means of a so-called "cost of living" standard, has been challenged by some of the country's foremost statisticians. It is charged that this whole method is based on a fallacy and a long-discarded conception of social conditions. It seems clear to me that wages determine standards and that cost-of-living standards will necessarily follow wage standards. Whether a man will wear a coat 1 year, 2 years, 5 years, or even wear one at all will depend upon his earning capacity. To arbitrarily confine his wages to any one of these possibilities will merely perpetuate that condition, effectually paralyzing and making impossible the progress which is the chief aim and purpose of the recovery program.

In addition to the Federal employees themselves, the disabled veterans have been severely penalized by the unfair and discriminatory provisions of the economy legislation. The money saved the Federal Government has merely been transferred to the already overburdened local welfare rolls throughout the country. As an illustration of how poorly the economy legislation has worked out I will mention that, of the 51,213 presumptive service-connected cases reviewed by the special boards of review, only 21,955, or 42.87 percent, were found to be service connected. The percentage of cases allowed varied from 23.43 percent to 74.68 percent in different localities. This means that, because of the more liberal interpretation of the law by some boards of some States, veterans in many States are being paid compensation for the same disability and type of evidence that disqualified veterans in Michigan and several other States. In my own city of Detroit the percentage of cases allowed was only 30.4 percent, while the State of Texas had 74.68 percent of its cases allowed.

Altogether, the economy legislation has resulted in dropping from the pension rolls 501,777 veterans, many of whom had depended entirely upon their meager monthly pension to defray their living expenses.

In summarizing the activities of the Federal Government in the past few months it becomes evident that a twofold course of action, aiming at a diminution of the purchasing power of one group of workers and at the increase of purchasing power of another group, has been followed. A strenuous campaign has been waged by the N.R.A. to improve living conditions and assist recovery by shortening hours of labor and increasing wage scales. Not one single benefit of this program has been extended to Federal employees. On the contrary, the various administrative furloughs inflicted upon Federal workers has increased their reduction in pay to as much as 50 percent in some instances. Government employees have been compelled to work long hours overtime without compensation.

The failure to extend the benefits given industrial workers by the N.R.A. to Government employees is a grave indication of lack of confidence in the recovery program. It is unreasonable and illogical to expect the confident acceptance of recovery measures by private industry when the Federal Government implies its own lack of faith in them. Restoration of the full salary reduction to Federal employees would more than amply repay the Nation for the additional funds so expended by the returns in confidence, purchasing power, and increased employment that would result. All in all, I repeat, this should be more than sufficient reason to vote "no" on this gag rule. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, section 3 (a) of the economy bill passed last year authorized the President to investigate, through established agencies of the Government, in reference to the cost of living, and upon the basis of such facts and the application thereto of such principles as he may find proper to alter the pay-cut provision of the economy act. It is to this point that I wish to address myself for a few minutes.

As a member of that committee, I have had no opportunity to hear a detailed discussion of these increased costs of living. So, when our subcommittee was in session, I asked General Hines if he would supply, through the chairman of our committee, an estimate of the amount of money necessary for supplies in his bureau. He did so, and his letter I have before me.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate this letter from General Hines as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. He stated under date of December 12 that the Veterans' Bureau was buying $13,000,000 worth of supplies. We know these goods are going into hospitals, and that these supplies are made up of various kinds of things—stationery, clothing, food, and so on.

Before the gavel falls I want to read the concluding paragraph of this letter. I shall read the balance if I have time. In the concluding paragraph General Hines says:

> It is apparent that a conservative estimate of the requirements to cover increases in prices for supplies, materials, and equipment will range from a minimum of 25 percent upward.
> FRANK D. HINES.

As I said, I am one member of this committee who has not seen a detailed study of the figures with regard to the increased cost of living. I am not convinced that the cost of living has gone up only 5 percent when the Chief of this great Veterans' Bureau, a Bureau of the Government buying at wholesale, admits that the advance is from 25 percent up. This is the issue here this afternoon.

The adoption of this rule—I will not go so far as to say makes it impossible for the Government employees' salaries to be increased—but it extends the Economy Act so that the President may increase them if he finds the cost of living has increased. If he finds, however, the cost of living has increased only 5 percent in the face of such facts as I am trying to give you here, what hope have they for relief during the next fiscal year?

Let us be fair about it. I agree with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. He has been very fair in his discussion of the rule. However, if you vote down the rule, you will automatically in the next fiscal year restore the 15-percent reduction in salaries to Government employees, as well as stop the effect of the Economy Act as it is in existence today, because that automatically goes out on June 30 of this year. In voting down this rule the legislative provisions are then subject to a point of order and will be ruled out without a further vote. That is the issue, and that is all there is to it.

If you believe that the cost of living has gone up only 5 percent, vote for the rule if you so desire, but I can read you item after item showing that the cost of living has advanced more than that. Coal that the Government is buying has increased from 50 to 150 percent. Medicines have increased 55 percent. General Hines himself admits that a very conservative estimate is 25 percent.

I do not believe there is a Member within the sound of my voice who really believes that the cost of living has not gone up more than even 10 percent. If you vote down the rule, you will restore those salaries.

The letter referred to by Mr. Goss is as follows:

DECEMBER 12, 1933.

Hon. CLIFTON WOODRUM,
Chairman Subcommittee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR MR. WOODRUM: Complying with your request that any available data be furnished showing the increase in prices of supplies and materials over and above the basic quotations used in the development of the 1935 appropriation estimates for the Veterans' Administration, the following analysis is submitted:

The amounts included in the 1935 appropriation estimates for supplies and materials by objects are:

Stationery and office supplies	$296,227
Cleaning and toilet supplies	323,030
Medical and hospital supplies	1,207,816
Orthopedic and prosthetic supplies	411,192
Fuel	896,392
Wearing apparel and sewing supplies	294,731
Forage and other supplies for animals	97,964
Provisions	7,960,736
Sundry supplies	253,000
Motor-vehicle supplies	62,442
Total	11,803,530

Equipment:
Motor vehicles	$50,000
Furniture and furnishings	701,250
Educational, scientific, and recreational	300,000
Livestock	15,000
Other	33,750
Total	1,100,000

The basis for the development of these amounts was taken from the fiscal year 1933 price trend and the average actual prices paid during that period, as well as the price trend for the months of July and August 1933. The actual prices and the price trend do not reflect to any extent the increase in price of commodities under the National Recovery Act, since the adoption of the codes regulating the industries and manufacturers were not effective until a later date, which was after the estimates had been prepared.

A check has been made of recent purchases by the Veterans' Administration of a number of commodities and the prices paid compared with the average prices for fiscal year 1933. These increases are shown by percent of increase over 1933 according to the class of commodity purchased and represents actual increases in prices paid.

	Percent
Stationery and office supplies:
Paper bags	30
Paper napkins	30–38
White bond paper	11
Mimeograph paper	36
Carbon paper	63
Rubber bands	51
Cleaning and toilet supplies:
Laundry soap	13
Powdered soap	14
Scouring powder	11
Medical and hospital supplies:
Drugs and prescriptions [1]	20–50
Smocks, physicians	74
Smocks, ward maids	89
Orthopedic and prosthetic supplies:
Contracts are already being canceled because dealers cannot afford to furnish these supplies at contract prices. Estimated increase during fiscal year 1935	25–50
Fuel:
Coal and fuel oil [1]	50–150
Wearing apparel and sewing supplies:
Chenille, cotton	23
Roving cotton	85
Thread, cotton, black (no. 50)	50
Thread, cotton, white (no. 50)	55
White cotton thread (no. 60)	62
Summer pajama coats	71
Summer pajama trousers	71
Worsted suits	46
Worsted trousers	101
White cook aprons	77
Cotton socks	120
Cotton wrapping twine	109

The textile code was among the first codes adopted, and consequently the material increase in prices is reflected in these items more so than other commodities for which purchases were made on former price scales.

	Percent
Provisions:
Butter	10
Peanut butter	23
Carrots	19
Golden Bantam corn, no. 2	9
White corn, no. 2	15
H.W. flour	90
S.W. flour	75
Macaroni	31
Water noodles	13
Spaghetti	34
Granulated sugar	8
Salad oil	17
Tea	62
Cereals	21
Smoked ham	45
Milk	11–50

The total of $11,803,530 requested in the estimates for supplies and materials does not take into consideration the increased price trends as indicated. Neither does the total of $1,100,000 requested for equipment reflect any price increases that the current quotations indicate.

It is apparent that a conservative estimate of the requirements to cover increase in prices for supplies, materials, and equipment will range from a minimum of 25 percent upward.

Very truly yours,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

[1] These percentages of increase are estimated, based upon the current prices. No actual figures are available on these items.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, when this rule was first proposed, frankly I was against it. But I would be untrue to myself if I did not take this opportunity of saying that since I have the assurance of those in charge on this side of the House that this rule cannot and will not be used to prevent the correction of those abuses of our veterans which have become so painfully apparent during the past year, I am going to support this resolution.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Speaker, the Nation has this afternoon listened to the Republicans tell the Democrats how bad they are and then it has listened to the Democrats tell the Republicans how bad they have been. The result of it will probably be that the Nation at large will believe both sides and vote Farmer-Labor henceforth.

We were all elected here to represent our people. I do not know of any reason in the world why we should come here and draw our salaries if we are going to make such rules as will prevent the expression of our opinions and which will prevent us from having a single thing to say with regard to the legislation that is being passed. We might just as well be told: Here it is, swallow it.

We hear the argument about one side wanting to hurt the President and the other side wanting to hurt the President. I am going to tell you that nothing will hurt the Democratic Party or the President more in the eyes of the public than to pass this rule. You are destroying every semblance of democracy. You are destroying the purpose and intent of this House. You are destroying absolutely what you were sent here to do. You are dodging the issue.

We owe something to these Federal employees. We owe something to these soldiers—these crippled soldiers from whom we stole the crutches in the last session, if you please. That is what we did. We even cut down the burial benefits.

I opposed the ruling of our Speaker of the House today for the same reason, and I feel that this rule is the beginning of the end of democracy in the United States. I shall vote "no" on the resolution.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. KNUTE HILL].

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I shall vote with the minority in opposition to this rule. I shall do so not because of the Republicans but rather in spite of them. I have at times voted with them and shall continue to do so when I feel they are right and turn from them when they are wrong.

The question before us today is just the matter of a gag rule and nothing else. The Republicans certainly know what the gag rule is. But the leaders of our side have "outgagged the gaggers."

I hold no brief for the Republican Party. In the first place, it needs none in this Congress. The shrewd and resourceful leader of the minority [Mr. SNELL] is fully capable of protecting its interests. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is a bulwark of strength with his lucid expression and beautiful diction—a worthy successor to the great Webster. Then again, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] also rivals in ability the great expounder and defender of the Constitution.

Again I repeat, I hold no brief for the opposition party because it is a first maxim of law that "He who comes into court must come with clean hands", and the hands of the leaders of the opposition are dripping with the pollution of unfair practices indulged in by them when they were in power. They played the game persistently and ruthlessly for 12 long years. I need only mention the methods used in enacting the iniquitous Hawley-Smoot tariff and the defeat at their hands for years of the popular "lame duck" amendment.

I address myself chiefly to the Members of the majority and especially to the leaders. I have fought this method of legislative procedure for 7 years and I shall continue to do so in the future. I am a new Member of this House, but am not a novice at the game. For three sessions of the Washington State Legislature, as a minority member, I opposed gag rule and dictation by a select few. It is even more distasteful under Democratic leadership because I was led to believe that the Democratic Party stood for an altogether different procedure.

The three great leaders of the Democratic Party have opposed such methods. Thomas Jefferson said that the least governed are the best governed, meaning thereby that we should all be considered as taking part in shaping our own responsible activities. Woodrow Wilson sponsored "Open covenants openly arrived at." Then, why not open legislation openly arrived at? Our present great leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, when Governor of New York, said:

> There are three ways of defeating proposed legislation. One is the method followed in the early days of our Republic and which most truly conforms to the correct practice of a democracy. This is consideration of each proposal in open session and serious debate, in an open-minded and nonpartisan spirit and with a sincere desire to weigh its merits. If it is found inadvisable or unwise, it is then slain after a fair and open battle, and the reasons for such action are open for all the voters to examine and judge for themselves. This is the way in which all bills of real importance which have been shown any considerable approval and support by the voters of the State should be treated.
> The second method is by the lash of the party whip, the demand on the legislators by their party leaders that they divide according to their political affiliations and leave to the master minds of their organizations the responsibility as to whether such action is justified or not. In this procedure the bill, when brought up for discussion, is foredoomed to failure, and all debates thereon are of a purely perfunctory nature; nor can any argument of reasoning change the final vote. There is no possible justification for the adoption of this course on bills which are avowedly nonpartisan in character.

This is the unqualified stand of our great President on this very issue, and yet the leaders draw a red herring across the trail and intimidate the timid ones by saying that if you do not vote for this gag rule you are against the President.

This method of procedure makes us look ridiculous in the eyes of the people. The duly elected Representatives in one branch of the Congress may not study, discuss, or amend a proposed measure, may not dot an "i" nor cross a "t"; but any one Member of the other branch of the Congress, the Senate, may offer any amendment to any bill and talk indefinitely on it. Is not the former a representative of the people and accountable to them the same as the latter? Is any material good accomplished by squelching the former while the latter deals with the same legislation uncontrolled?

The minority always has rights which should be protected, not only the minority party but the minority within the Democratic Party. I believe it was the great Frenchman, Voltaire, who said to one of his opponents, "I wholly disagree with what you say but will defend with my life your right to say it." The present leaders insisted on the rights of minorities for years. They fought for them. They have been eloquent in their insistence that they should be heard on every question. Read the RECORD for the Seventy-second Congress. Listen to our eloquent floor leader only on the opening day of this session, January 3:

> There is no disposition to prevent any Member of the House from having every opportunity to discuss any question that he may desire during this session, and my objection does not go to that extent. * * * If I can bring it about, every gentleman upon both sides of the House will have the fullest opportunity to discuss any question that is relevant to any matter that is before the House, and at the very earliest opportunity.

How does this promise by the floor leader on the 3d comport with his stand this afternoon?

Why this drastic change on the part of the leaders now when they are in the majority? Do they for a moment think that the great electorate throughout the United States will approve such a course? If so, they are greatly mistaken and had better keep in closer touch with the people back home who are taking far more interest in legislation and methods of procedure than ever before.

All these gag rules are unnecessary. We have an overwhelming majority in this House. We have all come here to enact constructive and beneficial legislation. We are all willing and anxious to follow the leadership of President Roosevelt, believing in his splendid vision and his courage. I resent the statement made here that we are against the President. I spent 3 months of my time this summer in going about my district urging people to stand back of him in his N.R.A. program, because I heartily believe in it and want the main features of it to become permanent.

As to the leadership in this House, we will gladly follow it when it is reasonable. But a considerable number of us who will gladly follow wise leadership absolutely refuse to be blindly driven by autocratic bosses. We demand a part in the consideration, the discussion, and the reshaping, where necessary, of proposed legislation. If our leaders or their leadership is so weak that they cannot hold our 200 majority in line without a gag rule, may I respectfully submit that they resign and give somebody a chance who can hold us in line. [Applause.] They can hold us in line for the fine policies advocated by our President if they will lead us, if they will counsel with us, if they will guide us. But the time has come now at the beginning of this new session when by the eternal gods there are going to be Members on this side of the House who will not be driven like sheep or moved like pawns on a chessboard. We are willing to cooperate, but only as men with men, with our full rights and responsibilities to our constituents recognized. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time, 5½ minutes, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, a little more than 100 of us this morning cast our vote in opposition to the decision handed down by the Speaker, whom we all love, because we felt it was adding a regrettable chapter to the parliamentary history that is being written in the series of decisions and precedents in accumulation since the beginning of this body. I feel that some of those who voted, perhaps out of a mistaken sense of loyalty, to sustain that decision and let it stand for all time in the RECORD of this House may by this time have discovered that it was not their well-considered judgment. I hope on second thought they will feel that they can vote with the group here that is trying to resist the application of this rule, admittedly one of the harshest and most drastic that has ever been brought into this body.

Let us be honest. Let us recall just what is involved here. This proposed rule not only waives all points of order, it not only prohibits any Member not on the committee from offering an amendment or having it considered, it not only applies to policies that many of us are resisting as to salaries, wages, and other benefits; it not only applies to title II of this measure, mind you, but it reaches out into the future and applies to similar provisions in all the appropriation bills that are coming in here during this session. Get that.

Mr. Speaker, I still believe with the President of the United States—as demonstrated in his message to us on the opening day—that the legislative body should function and should have some responsibility, and when the day comes when I do not think I can exercise my responsibilities or do not desire to exercise them, then I shall resign from this body and never ask the citizens of my district and State to repose in me the faith and confidence which they have exhibited so far.

Now, what are we doing today? Oh, "Consistency, thou art a jewel", is a saying we often invoke. On one side we are telling our people that the program of recovery is working, that we are speeding up industry, that we are putting men back to work, that we are raising the standards of living, that we are adding to wage envelops, and that over all the Nation recovery is returning, times are going to be boom times, and prices are going to rise. We are asking our farmers to be patient just a week or two or a month or two longer until their commodity prices rise. Consider well the figures that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS] has read.

Then, while we try to convince our people that recovery is here and that purchasing power is and must be increased, to this group composed of Federal employees and the veterans we say that such times are not here and that living costs have not risen to a point where we can restore these wage cuts.

We may make many artful statements here regarding the application and meaning of this rule, but we know that here and now is the fight. You cannot deceive the Federal employees, whose representative sits in his customary seat up there. You cannot deceive the veterans' organizations, two national commanders of which have been sitting in the galleries this afternoon. You cannot deceive the people who still look to you for responsible performance of duty.

Let us defeat this rule, I plead with you, my colleagues, and I do believe that you will then see the members of the Rules Committee scurrying around and bringing in a rule more to our liking.

I have voted for gag rules, but certainly not a rule of this breadth, certainly not a rule so wide in its application, certainly not a rule so repugnant to all sense of legislative responsibility.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know the gentleman's interest in humane legislation and in labor, but does not the gentleman know that the figures prepared by the Department of Labor itself show that the average wage of the industrial worker in this country is much lower than that paid to Government employees?

Mr. KVALE. I have a suspicion that that is not the complete picture. I also have a suspicion that the gentleman from Alabama, with his diligence and conscience, is, today, performing a task that to him is personally distasteful.

I speak now my sentiments, and I venture to say I voice the feelings of all the Membership of this House, when I say I thank God every day I live that we have in the White House a man with the vision, a man with the courage, a man with a grasp of the situation, and a man with the heart and the judgment of Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.] But I reserve to myself the right to differ with him. I reserve to myself the right to hold the belief, when I have it, that he is not fully informed. I reserve to myself the right to believe that sometimes, from some sides, he has the pressure of great and organized forces of wealth and power and not the true picture that comes from the inarticulate, from the defenseless, and from the unorganized.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Is it not true that if we adopt this rule we are assassinating here today the right of free speech, the right of individual opinion, and the right of individual judgment for the rest of the session?

Mr. KVALE. I might not use quite as forceful language as that, but certainly——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the majority leader, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, some reference was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] to an interview which I was said to have given with reference to special rules. I think the Members of this House know my position with reference to rules generally, for I have expressed it often enough.

I was speaking at that time of the necessity demanded at the special session, with the emergency bills which were proposed and had to be passed without delay, and necessarily under special rules. I said I hoped that no such necessity would arise in the future nor did I think it would. I said that personally I favored the consideration of legislation on the floor of the House under the general rules of the House, insofar as it could be done.

The gentleman from New York himself knows, as we all know, that in every session of Congress the time comes when it is necessary to propose a rule, as it became necessary in this particular instance.

The same paper which carried the interview with me to which the gentleman refers a few days ago carried the statement, before the words of the gentleman from New York and the Senator from Oregon were cold on their lips, that they were not going to show any partisanship; that they were going along; and yet that statement gave the names of members of the Republican Party who had been delegated to sit constantly on the floor of the House, watch the legislative proceedings—with what purpose? Not to offer helpful legislation, but to criticize and condemn whenever opportunity offered. Undoubtedly the people will appraise such partisan criticism at its true value.

Now, ladies and gentlemen of the House, last March we were in the midst of a great fight. It is not over, but we are in the midst of a winning fight against depression in this country. Last month I enlisted, as you enlisted, under the banner of the leader of the Nation—the President in the White House. I enlisted to help him as best I could, in my humble way, to carry on that fight to feed the hungry mouths in this country, to put millions of people back to work to make industry profitable, and to relieve agriculture.

And be it said to the credit of the gentlemen on the minority side that practically all of them, almost without exception, enlisted under the leadership of the President of the United States.

The fight is on today as it was then, and I for one am not going to desert the standard of my leader in the midst of the fight. [Applause.]

Is there anyone here who will say for a moment that conditions are not better today than they were on March 4? Millions of people have been put back to work. Millions of little children and women are being fed today when in March they saw no hope. Agriculture is getting better, industry and business are improving, but the fight is not yet wholly won. We cannot loiter on the way in this fight which is being led by the President of the United States.

Are you and I going to face the people who sent us here and say that in the midst of battle, when victory was in sight, we deserted our leader and turned our backs upon him? That is the whole question. That is the whole proposition confronting you gentlemen on the minority side. The people are not willing to play politics in this time and day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman know of any President within the last 50 years who in his opinion has shown more interest and solicitude to protect the interest of labor in the United States than has Franklin D. Roosevelt?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not, and I do not think that statement will be gainsaid by any gentleman on the floor of this House.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Not now. There never has been in the history of this country a President of the United States whose administration has given more consideration to labor than has that of Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause.] Gentlemen who oppose this rule, and also the lady from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], have gotten on the floor and done what some of us have chosen to term "drawing a red herring across the trail." They talk about the veterans. They talk about labor, and they have attempted to confuse the proposition now before the House with questions of relief for the veterans and relief for labor. It has been stated here time and again——

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I beg the lady's pardon, but I do not wish to be interrupted at the present time. It has been stated time and again that there is not one thing in this rule which refers to veterans or to labor or which will prevent this House at any future time from passing a bill for the relief of the veterans, or secure an appropriation, if a majority of the Congress desire that it be done. This rule applies only to salary cuts and to automatic promotions and also to certain pensions paid under private bills and the pensions of widows of soldiers of the Civil War. That is the whole proposition, that and nothing more. The President stated the other day in his message that owing to existent emergent conditions, and the necessity for spending millions of dollars to bring relief to the people, we are going to have on that account alone a deficit this year, I think, he said of something like seven billions of dollars. He said that next year, in his judgment, it would be reduced to two billions, and he hopes and believes that in the third year we would get out of the red and be able to balance the Budget. This is by no means alarming. The per capita indebtedness of the United States is $190, and if the indebtedness of State and municipal governments is added, it is $250—whereas the per capita of Great Britain, with far smaller resources and wealth, is $700. This proposition means, as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations told you, $170,000,000 to the Treasury of the United States. The President of the United States, in his effort to conserve the interests of this country and to carry on his great program, has said to you that this is a part of his recovery program.

As I view it, while personally I might differ with reference to some of these provisions, as some of you know, I believe it is my duty in this crisis, in this war, which, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] said, is greater in its effect than any war we have ever had, to stand by the President of the United States, and his effort to relieve the country—and I say that despite the jeers which I hear from some gentleman on the Republican side. And I say further, this is no time to jeer at the mention of the President of the United States; no time to jeer at the effort being made by the President to carry out his pledges to the people of the country and to give relief. It was a godsend when the President was inaugurated on March 4; and while some of you gentlemen may not agree, the people of this country, Republicans as well as Democrats, believe today that if Franklin D. Roosevelt had not become President, we would now be on the road to collapse and chaos. Every bank in the country was in trouble under the policy pursued by the Republican Party for the last 12 years; nearly every bank was about to close its doors. Business was going to ruin, the people were going into bankruptcy. Agriculture was staggering and suffering, and over 12,000,000 men were unemployed, all as a result of 12 years of Republican misrule.

What are you going to do, fellow Democrats, if I may talk to you? What are you going to do? He is your President, he is my President. He is asking you to give him this legislation. Are you going to give it to him, or are you going to say to him at the first test, that we are not going to stand by him?

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. This bill, as I understand it, restores 5 percent of the 15-percent pay cut as of the 30th of June, does it not, and takes it out of the hands of the President at that time?

Mr. BYRNS. It does. It restores 5 percent of the 15 percent and gives to the President the right to restore it all if conditions justify it on June 30 or at any time during the coming fiscal year, as I hope can be done. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAY. I have not been permitted to debate this bill, but I have kept my mind open like an honest judge until the conclusion of the argument on both sides. I desire to inquire of the Speaker and to state this parliamentary inquiry: If the rule under consideration is passed by the House, will the provisions of the rule preclude the House from considering and passing any legislative bill affecting veterans and Federal employees, or the modifying or amending of provisions of Public Act No. 2, a bill to maintain the credit of the United States Government, known as the "Economy Act", during the present session of Congress?

Mr. MAPES. A point of order. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is a parliamentary inquiry. It would not. This only affects legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. On that I demand the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 216, nays 179, not voting 35, as follows:

Mr. ELLENBOGEN. Mr. Speaker, when the roll call was had this afternoon on the ruling on the point of order of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] I was at the White House conferring with the President, and was therefore unavoidably absent. Had I been present I would have voted to sustain the decision of the Speaker. I want the RECORD to show this.

Mr. DOUGHTON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Ways and Means, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 6131) to raise revenue by taxing certain intoxicating liquors, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in all Senate amendments.

"SEC. 208. This title shall take effect on the thirtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, except that if on or before the twentieth day following the date of the enactment of this act the Secretary of the Treasury finds that it is impracticable to put this title into effect on the thirtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act and so proclaims, specifying the date, not later than the sixtieth day following the date of the enactment of this act, on which it will be practicable to put this title into effect, this title shall take effect on the date specified in such proclamation. Notwithstanding the previous provisions of this section, this section and sections 202, 203, and 205 shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this act."

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do so only to make a statement, it seems to me it is quite unusual not to send to conference a bill as important as this. The amendments of the Senate, however, are more or less of a perfecting character and the minority are anxious to join with the majority in aiding the Treasury of the United States in every way possible. So, the sooner this bill is enacted into law, the better it will suit the minority, and the whole Ways and Means Committee will be satisfied.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman think the Senate amendment reducing the brewers' license from $1,000 to $100 is of a perfecting nature?

Mr. TREADWAY. If the gentleman wants to get into a debate on the subject that is his privilege, but I do say that the amendments that were presented to the Ways and Means Committee this afternoon by our distinguished chairman, are of a very minor character. The sooner the bill is enacted into law the better it will be for the Treasury, because this is a money bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. For the moment I reserve the right to object to get some explanation as to why the license fee of the brewers was cut down to 10 percent of the fee that was contained in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. DOUGHTON of North Carolina. The reason that was done was to leave the greater part of the occupational tax to the States.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman having this bill in charge the effect of the transportation amendment inserted by the Senate.

Mr. DOUGHTON of North Carolina. It prohibits transportation into so-called "dry" States.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. It is the Reed amendment without the advertising clause. Advertising matter may be sent into these States through the mail.

Mr. BRITTEN. That will be permitted under the Senate amendment?

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Yes; but transportation of liquor into dry States will be prohibited.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute to make an announcement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, so far as I know, we have covered the controversial features of the independent offices appropriation bill. I believe that if the House met at 11 o'clock tomorrow, we could finish the consideration of the bill tomorrow. So far as the members of the committee are concerned, we are willing to conform to the wishes of the House, and a great many Members have expressed the hope we might have Saturday to do the work that accumulates on our desks. Some Members wish to go out of the city over the week-end. I believe if we could meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, and if the members of the committee would cooperate with us, we could conclude the consideration of the bill tomorrow night.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when I discussed the situation with the gentleman from Virginia I thought it might be possible to work out some such program as he suggests, but on this side we have had a great many requests for time. I have at present requests for between two and a half and 3 hours. I really do not see how we could get through tomorrow, even if we were to meet at 11 o'clock.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, if we do not, it will be necessary to have a session on Saturday. I was trying to accommodate the Members of the House, but if they wish to sit on Saturday, I am willing to stay here as long as the House desires to proceed.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that if we do not finish the bill tomorrow the whole matter might go over until Monday.

Mr. WOODRUM. The leadership has advised me, Mr. Speaker, that it is very desirable to have the consideration of the bill concluded this week in order that next week may be free for any program that may develop.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I am constrained to object.

JAMES WILLIAM COLLIER

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLZEY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I arise to announce the death of Hon. James William Collier, a former Member of the House from the State of Mississippi, who passed away in the city of Washington on September 28, 1933. He was born near Vicksburg in Warren County, Miss., September 28, 1872. He was the distinguished son of a gallant Confederate soldier.

For 24 years Mr. Collier was a Member of this body, and during his last term served as chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means. At the time of his death he was a member of the United States Tariff Commission.

Because of his attractive personality, patriotism, and loyalty to American ideals, he was highly esteemed and universally beloved by his colleagues, and I am fully confident that I voice the sentiment of all in expressing profound regret of his death.

PATRICK HENRY

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Speaker, it is with regret that I announce the death of Hon. Patrick Henry, who represented the Third District of Mississippi in the Fifty-seventh Congress for the term beginning March 4, 1901, and ending March 3, 1903.

Patrick Henry was born near Helena, in Phillips County, Ark., on February 15, 1861. With his parents he moved to Vicksburg in 1865, where he died on December 29, 1933. He was educated in the common schools, attended the United States Military Academy, and was for 2 years a student at the University of Mississippi. At the age of 21 he was admitted to the bar and from the first he was attracted to the public service.

Patrick Henry possessed a magnetic personality and was the central figure in any group where he appeared. He knew how to make and keep friends. He was exceedingly popular and one promotion after another in public life came to him.

Shortly after his admission to the bar he was elected attorney for the city of Vicksburg. He resigned as State senator to become district or prosecuting attorney of the judicial district in which he lived. While occupying the position of district attorney he was appointed circuit judge, and in a little more than a year after his appointment to the bench he was nominated and elected a Member of Congress from the Third District of Mississippi.

The Third Congressional District, prior to the redistricting act of 1902, is substantially the Third District of the present time. At the time of the service of Judge Henry, Warren County was in the district and Holmes County was not; Humphreys County at present in the district, had not been created.

After serving Congress for one term, Judge Henry retired and was successfully engaged in the practice of law until the time of his death. He continued to maintain an interest in political and public affairs and exercised a potent influence in shaping and controlling public opinion throughout his long career.

ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 6131

Mr. DOUGHTON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 218

Resolved, That, notwithstanding the adjournment of the House, the Speaker be, and he is hereby, authorized to sign the enrolled bill of the House (H.R. 6131).

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE ECONOMY ACT

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, it has been said by many Members of the House today that if we vote against the rule it meant a vote against the President's program. I wish to state that is not my opinion. I have supported many of the President's measures, such as the National Industrial Recovery Act, the public-works program, the act guaranteeing the safety of bank deposits, the Home Owners' Loan Act, and many other progressive measures. In fact, I do not hesitate to say that President Roosevelt is one of the most progressive men ever chosen by the citizens of the United States to be their Chief Executive.

It is true, like many other Members of Congress, I did not support the economy bill, because I do not believe it is economy to take away any compensations or pensions from our ex-service men and their dependents; neither do I believe it is economy to reduce the salaries of Federal employees 15 percent. There are many men and women with big responsibilities employed by the Government whose salaries are less than $60 a month. I believe that part of the Economy Act which took away the pensions and compensations from World War and Spanish-American War veterans and reduced the salaries of Federal employees 15 percent should be repealed.

It is my opinion that if an amendment to the bill which is before the House for consideration would be accepted providing for a minimum wage of 75 cents per hour and also have inserted in the bill a 5-day, 6-hour clause, I believe it would pass. It would also manifest to the citizens of the United States that the Federal Government had taken the initiative in regards to higher wages—which means a higher standard of living. If Congress would enact a 5-day, 6-hour law and a minimum wage of 75 cents for our Federal employees, I have not any doubt the owners of mills, mines, and factories would do likewise. This progressive step should be taken by Congress.

CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. LEHR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by incorporating therein three short resolutions adopted last week by the Michigan Municipal League of Ann Arbor, Mich.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEHR. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolutions recently adopted by the Michigan Municipal League of Ann Arbor, Mich.:

CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Whereas the C.W.A., through decentralized administration, has promptly given employment to many who were recipients of public relief and to others destitute but not yet on relief; and

Whereas business has been thus stimulated by the distribution of purchasing power, resulting in a more hopeful and optimistic attitude generally; and

Whereas the brief experience thus far with civil works has proved it to be an effective agent for national recovery and at the same time creating many needed and useful works which would otherwise have been neglected; and

Whereas the present allotment of men to Michigan is approximately one fifth of the registered unemployed: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League request Congress not only to continue the present C.W.A. program but to materially expand it as a supplement to relief and public-works appropriations.

Carried unanimously, January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich. [SEAL]

FEDERAL AID FOR PUBLIC WORKS

Whereas we believe sound public works to be a most important part of the national recovery program; and

Whereas Michigan, hampered by statutory and constitutional restrictions, has been unable to take advantage of Federal aid for public works; and

Whereas only approximately half of the applications presented to the State advisory board on public works have been forwarded to Washington; and

Whereas it appears that the public works fund is nearly exhausted, a major part of which has been allotted to Federal projects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League request the President and the Congress to appropriate additional funds to non-Federal public works.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be presented to the President and to Michigan's Representatives in Congress.

Passed unanimously January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich. [SEAL]

REFUNDING MUNICIPAL DEBT

Whereas there are many cities and villages and other governmental units in Michigan in default on their bonded debt; and

Whereas there is no existing legislation which will permit municipal governments to bring about an adjustment of their debts with their creditors except with the unanimous consent thereof; and

Whereas it is our belief that both cities and creditors will continue to suffer hardship unless some definite legal manner is provided for the adjustment of municipal debts: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Michigan Municipal League, composed of cities and villages in the State of Michigan, favor the enactment of the Summers-Wilcox bill now before Congress, which will permit cities, through the Federal courts, with the consent of their creditors, to readjust their debts on the basis of their ability to pay.

Passed unanimously January 3, 1934.

Submitted by the Michigan Municipal League, Ann Arbor, Mich.

TAX LAWS ON INTOXICATING LIQUORS IN PUERTO RICO AND THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for consideration at this time the bill (H.R. 6574) to make inapplicable in Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands certain Federal laws relating to intoxicating liquors.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Is this request agreeable to the minority members of the committee?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Thoroughly so. The bill applies only to intoxicating liquors in the Virgin Islands and the island of Puerto Rico.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the prohibitions and limitations contained in the following laws on the transportation, importation, exportation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors shall not apply in Puerto Rico: The twentieth paragraph of section 2 of the Organic Act of Puerto Rico, approved March 2, 1917; title II of the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented; paragraph 814 of section 1 of the Tariff Act of 1930; and the act entitled "An act to provide revenue by the taxation of certain nonintoxicating liquors, and for other purposes", approved March 22, 1933.

SEC. 2. The prohibitions and limitations contained in title II of the National Prohibition Act, as amended and supplemented, on the transportation, importation, exportation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicating liquors shall not apply in the Virgin Islands.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p.m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, January 12, 1934, at 12 o'clock noon.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF STATE.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Wyoming, ss:

I, A. M. Clark, secretary of state of the State of Wyoming, do hereby certify that the annexed is a full, true, and correct copy of enrolled Joint Resolution No. 2, senate, of the special session of the Twenty-second Legislature of the State of Wyoming, being original Senate Joint Resolution No. 16, approved December 27, 1933, at 3:34 p.m.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State of Wyoming.

Done at Cheyenne, the capital, this 5th day of January, A.D. 1934.

A. M. CLARK,
Secretary of State.
By C. J. ROGERS,

Senate joint resolution memorializing Congress to provide relief for the oil industry, the farmers, the unemployed, business, and the people generally by providing an adequate tariff or tax on oil that will place the domestic oil industry on a competitive basis with imported oil as shown by the reports of the Tariff Commission

Whereas business generally, not only in Wyoming but throughout all the oil-producing States affecting over 22,000,000 people, has been directly depressed by the long distressed condition of the oil industry, and which depressed condition has now become very serious; and

Whereas excessive importations of foreign oils continue to flow into our country, constantly increasing in volume, until the flood has reached alarming proportions; and

Whereas in the year 1932, in Wyoming alone, the total production of crude oil was over $11,800,000 less than for the year 1929, which tremendous loss would have been saved had there been a tax or a tariff of $1.03 per barrel on crude oil, thereby placing domestic oil on a competitive basis with importations as shown by the latest report of the Tariff Commission; and

Whereas the rentals and annual royalty income have been reduced millions of dollars yearly, which increasing loss continues to add to already unbearable burdens; and

Whereas the schools of Wyoming have suffered severely in the loss of nearly $125,000 in gross oil royalty receipts in the single year of 1932 compared with the gross royalties received in 1929; and

Whereas not only have our royalty owners and the schools sustained severe losses, but also banking, transportation, manufacturing, industry, utility, and every type and character of business have been adversely affected by the distressed condition of the oil industry and by the great loss in purchasing power due to the taking of our domestic markets by the importations of cheap foreign oil; and

Whereas the general unemployment situation has been very greatly aggravated by the thousands of oil-field workers, geologists, landmen, lease men, scouts, and office employees, forced out of employment, and by the thousands now unemployed but formerly employed by businesses dependent on the oil industry, the third largest industry in the Nation: Now, therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Wyoming (the house of representatives concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, memorialized to give relief to the distressed oil industry, and thereby to the Nation generally, by immediately levying an adequate tax or tariff upon imported petroleum and its refined products, that will enable our domestic oil industry to meet importations of foreign oil and its refined products on a competitive basis as shown by the report of the Tariff Commission; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, and to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the United States Senators and Congressmen representing the State of Wyoming.

OSCAR BECK,
President of the Senate.
WM. M. JACK,
Speaker of the House.

Approved 3:34 p.m. December 27, 1933.

LESLIE A. MILLER,
Governor.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, relating to relief for the dairy industry, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See joint resolution printed in full when presented by Mr. LA FOLLETTE on the 11th instant, p. 404, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, memorializing Congress to recognize the Federal Government's obligation to share equitably the proceeds of liquor taxes with the States, counties, and cities and to prevent intergovernmental competition in the field of liquor taxation through the adoption of the recommendations presented by the Interstate Commerce Commission on Conflicting Taxation with the authority of the interstate assembly, which was ordered to lie on the table.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY—MEMORIAL

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table a copy of resolutions adopted by the Railroad Employees and Taxpayers' Association of Connecticut on the subject of the pending treaty.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At the annual meeting of the Railroad Employees and Taxpayers' Association of Connecticut, held in the city of New Haven, Conn., on Friday, January 5, 1934, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the construction and operation of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway, as proposed by treaty now pending in the United States Senate for ratification or rejection, would seriously interfere with the economic, social, and political security of the citizens of the United States, and particularly those residing in New England; and

"Whereas the construction of this project would create additional, subsidized, and unneeded transportation competitive with heavily taxed and regulated railroads; and

"Whereas this project, if completed, would be open for use during only 7 months of the year, which is economically unsound: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Railroad Employees and Taxpayers' Association of Connecticut recommend to the President of the United States and to the United States Senate that the proposed treaty be rejected, as it involves an unsound expenditure of public funds for a purpose which is unjustified in the national interest; be it further

"Resolved, That this resolution be spread on the records of the Railroad Employees and Taxpayers' Association of Connecticut and that authenticated copies thereof be forwarded forthwith to the President of the United States and the United States Senators of Connecticut."

I, Edward C. Brooks, secretary of the Railroad Employees and Taxpayers' Association of Connecticut, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of record, and in testimony thereof I have hereunto set my hand this 9th day of January 1934.

EDWARD C. BROOKS, Secretary.

PROTECTION OF DOMESTIC MARKET FOR FARM AND DAIRY PRODUCTS

As in legislative session,

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD and appropriately referred a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of Minnesota demanding protection for the domestic market for farm and dairy products. In view of the unprecedented fall of prices in farm and dairy products it is about time that the administration make use of its tariff powers already granted it by Congress. The resolution is logical, reasonable, and timely, the Governor of Minnesota to the contrary notwithstanding, in his own words to me, as follows:

I doubt that anyone will agree with you that increased tariffs will solve our difficulties—

And I sincerely hope that it will be favorably acted upon at an early date.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution memorializing the President, Secretary of Agriculture, and the Congress relative to the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act

Whereas there is now in process of administration the Agricultural Adjustment Act whereby and through its operations Minnesota farmers, with others, are being asked to reduce production of basic agricultural commodities to an American consumption basis, that in turn for the acceptance by voluntary agreements farmers are being paid by the National Government for reducing said commodities.

Whereas under present agricultural conditions reduction of production of grain, dairy, and livestock products will make possible the development in increased consumption of substitutes for products so reduced: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Minnesota (and the senate concurring), That we demand on the part of the administration that if farmers are to limit production to domestic requirements that they be assured the domestic market on the products so reduced; no program for production control can be expected to attain the desired results unless the domestic market for farm and dairy products is protected.

If the agricultural industry must agree to a plan of control production, we demand that the Secretary of Agriculture, the President, and Congress do their part; which part involves restriction of imports of dairy products and of fats and oils coming in duty free and in competition with the dairy and livestock producer.

(b) The controlling of manufacture of oleomargarine, the forbidding of importation of cured and canned meats, sago, tapioca, and starches which come in competition with the livestock and grain producer; be it further

Resolved, That the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Congress adopt such measures as will make possible the retention of American market to American agriculture on the products which American agriculture is being asked to reduce the production; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Members of Congress from Minnesota, and that they be requested to enforce these demands.

CHAS. MUNN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
K. K. SOLBERG,
President of the Senate.

Passed the House of Representatives the 20th day of December 1933.

HARRY L. ALLEN,

G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR NORRIS ON PRESENTATION OF CARDINAL NEWMAN AWARD

As in legislative session,

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, on November 16, 1933, the acknowledged dean of American progressives, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was given, at the University of Illinois, the Cardinal Newman award for distinguished public service. On that occasion Senator NORRIS delivered an address, which, like so many other of his utterances, has deservedly attracted general attention. His remarks were noteworthy for their sincerity, intelligence, integrity, and humanity—qualities which have given Senator NORRIS his ever-widening leadership. I ask unanimous consent to have that address printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NEW CIVILIZATION

Is our civilization breaking down? Is our governmental structure giving way under the terrible problems now encumbering the road of human progress? Are the wise men of today unable to analyze these problems after generations of progress from barbarism to what we have boasted as a high state of civilization? Are we now to surrender to doubt and to admit our inability to carry on?

With food rotting in numberless storehouses, millions of our people are starving for something to eat. In this land of plenty untold numbers are roaming the streets hunting for work. While our warehouses and stores are packed with clothing, thousands of women and children are clothed in rags. With fuel mountain high, millions of American firesides are cheerless, surrounded by innocent children shivering with cold. We are starving because we have produced too much food. We are freezing because we have too much fuel. We can scarcely cover our nakedness because we have manufactured too much clothing.

It is plainly evident that something is seriously wrong with our civilization. Everyone acknowledges that the burden of permanently feeding and clothing an army of 12,000,000 unemployed is too great for organized society to bear. This burden, if it must be borne indefinitely, will break down any system of public charity or any system of taxation that can possibly be devised. Unless we meet this situation, unless we solve this question, our civilization, our Government, our constituted society must fail and we will all be plunged into utter chaos. It would be interesting to study and trace the causes which have brought us into this condition, but the most important immediate question for solution is to devise ways and means to meet this terrible emergency. It would not be difficult to trace a large portion of our trouble to the Great War, but we would find, if we analyzed the question honestly and logically, that many of our difficulties have come from various and different causes; and while, without doubt, the war has been one of the great causes of our trouble and has to a great extent precipitated the difficulty much sooner than it would otherwise have happened, yet a fair analysis would disclose that for many years, unrealized and unknown to us, there existed in our system of civilization many other things that would have eventually compelled us to face the difficult problems which now confront us.

The mad and selfish rush for money, the unexplained desire to accumulate wealth at all hazards, has for a century been one of the evil influences in our civilization. The great World War accentuated this. It has added to the fuel and increased the flames. The added burdens placed upon the shoulders of civilized men and women everywhere as a result of the war, burdens which have not been shared equally, but have been shifted by money kings and monopolies to the shoulders of those who were not to blame for the war and were innocent of other demoralizing causes, have had the effect, not only of adding to the distress and the suffering of the innocent, but it has, to a great degree, shielded the guilty from the evil effects of their own acts.

Wonderful developments in improved labor-saving machinery have all added to the difficulties and helped to precipitate the crisis. War is always an incentive to invention. Nothing is truer than the old, well-known saying that "Necessity is the mother of invention." The necessities of the war set millions of ingenious minds working in the direction of new discoveries. Many of these inventions were only partially perfected when the war closed so that the result of this stimulating influence was not felt until several years after the war was over.

The year 1929 was regarded by many people as the high mark in our prosperity, but reliable statistics demonstrate that by improved machinery installed since that date, we could today manufacture and produce all the goods that could be consumed with 6,000,000 less men than were employed at that time. That means if the people had the purchasing power, and we put existing machinery into operation, and supplied all the goods that could be consumed by all the people, we would still have an army of unemployed of 6,000,000 men. While this would be an improvement over the conditions of today, yet it would still leave an unbearable burden upon the shoulders of humanity. We would still have our unemployment problem unsolved.

Emergency relief is imperative to save the institutions of our civilization, but when we have achieved that accomplishment, we have only postponed our difficulty. It is not enough to solve the emergency question, important and necessary as that is. We must, in addition, meet and solve the still greater question of permanent relief. We are not fair if we pass this question on to our children. We ought to give to our posterity a world of opportunity freed from this ominous threat which, if not properly met and solved, will mean that those who follow us will be met face to face in the march of human progress with the difficult question we have failed to solve, and have unjustly, and perhaps cowardly, avoided.

The difference between civilization and barbarism is mainly the use of machinery and artificial implements in the daily life of mankind. This improvement has been coming on from the beginning. It has been so gradual that where men and women lost their positions because of improved machinery they had no difficulty in finding other places in other lines of human endeavor where they could employ their abilities and receive the pay that was necessary to keep them in comparative comfort.

The new inventions of labor-saving machines which have taken place during the last 20 years have equaled similar improvements over more than 100 years.

War always has the tendency to create great combinations of wealth. At the close of every war the wealth of the countries engaged was owned and possessed by less people than owned the property at the beginning of the war. The World War, being the greatest of all in history, has had a tremendous effect in that direction. Moreover, the destructive nature of war itself always puts upon the shoulders of the survivors burdens which never were thought of at the beginning. During 4 years all the people of practically all the nations of the earth were bending all their energies in one direction—to destroy property and human life. The inventions emanating from ingenious minds were devoted to the development of machinery that was entirely destructive. It is an economic axiom that society in general has to stand this loss and has to rebuild and reconstitute at the close of the war the destruction and devastation which were brought on by the war. It is a burden coming all at once, and it has been almost too much for humanity to bear.

Let me explain by an illustration. Let us take to illustrate the point a manufacturing establishment engaged in the production of some product universally used throughout the country. The owner of this establishment, we will say, employs 1,000 men. He pays each one of these men $5 a day. He sells the product of his factory to the public at large. The daily wage which he pays, therefore, amounts to $5,000. Let us assume that he makes a profit of $5 a day upon each one of his employees. There are three classes of people who have a direct interest in the success of this factory. First, there is the man who owns it. He is entitled to a reasonable return upon his investment and upon his management. Second, there are the 1,000 employees, who are entitled to a wage which will enable them to live in comfortable circumstances and in a condition to save enough money from their wages to take care of them in old age. Third, there are the numberless consumers who buy the product of the factory, and without whose purchasing power the factory could not operate and the 1,000 men could not have employment.

The expense for labor in this factory is $5,000 a day, and the gross output amounts to $10,000 a day, but after the factory has been in operation for some time, improved machinery has been invented and installed and the owner of the factory finds that by means of this improved machinery he can double the output of the factory with half the number of employees. The next step is that he discharges one half of his employees. Therefore, 500 men must look for jobs elsewhere, but the owner of the factory now sells his output for $20,000 a day instead of $10,000, and his expense for labor is just one half what it was before. He has only 500 flesh-and-blood men on his pay roll. He has employed 500 bloodless men in the way of iron and steel machinery, and upon these men he is making more than double the profit he made upon the same number of flesh-and-blood men. We are assuming, for the purpose of illustration, that the owner of the factory is retaining all the profit coming to him by reason of the improved machinery. This will be the case if he is able to bring it about. If, in this new adjustment, the other two classes of people were given the proper consideration, he would sell his product much cheaper than he did before, and he would pay higher wages to the remaining employees. To some extent he may be compelled by competition to do this, but he will do no more of it than he is compelled to do. This is said without criticism of the owner. It is perfectly legal, under our system, for him to make all the profit he possibly can. After he has operated this way for some time, more improvement takes place, and by the installment of improved machinery he is able to discharge one half of the remaining men, and still by the same operation increase the output of his factory. If the consumer, the laborer, and the owner of the factory got their proper share of this improvement, no great difficulty would confront us. But everybody knows this is not the case. We now have in this factory 250 men working where there were 1,000 men before. Seven hundred and fifty men have been discharged. They have lost their jobs and are seeking work in some other activity of human life. If they were always able to obtain it, the difficulty would be very much diminished, but what has been going on in this factory, has been going on in millions of others, and these 750 men find that the same operation has taken place in all other lines, and they are, therefore, unable to get jobs. They have not only lost their purchasing power but they have become part of the great army of unemployed, and they, and their families, must be supported either from public taxation or from private charity. The owner of the factory now has 250 flesh-and-blood men in his employ and he has 750 bloodless iron men. In reality, he has 750 slaves. It is a slavery of which no one complains because there are no human beings in the slave army, but these 750 slaves wear no clothes, they eat no food, they have no wives and children to support. They have no purchasing power. They do not object to the working hours; they will work, without complaint, 24 hours a day if necessary, and all the profit of their labor goes to the man who owns them, the man who owns the factory. He is accumulating wealth, he is building up a fortune, but he is perhaps not aware that he is traveling a road that means, in the end, absolute destruction for him and all his accumulated wealth.

When this illustration is multiplied by millions, we have an army of unemployed scattered all over the country that constitutes a living illustration that something is seriously wrong with our civilization and perhaps with our Government. The purchasing power of millions of men has been destroyed. The merchant has lost his customers, the farmer finds no one to buy his product. The farmer is required to produce the food we eat and the clothes we wear at a financial loss to himself. He loses his purchasing power, and millions of other men who have been thus discharged from work shops and factories have lost their purchasing power, and the result is that the oustomers, the consumers who have heretofore bought the product of the factory, to a very great extent have lost their purchasing power, and this factory operated and run by iron slaves finds that its output cannot be sold. There is no one to buy, and the owner of the factory finds himself bankrupt. He becomes a pauper because he has made too much money. He is poor because he bent all his energies to satisfy his selfish ambition to acquire more wealth. He has failed because his very success has destroyed the purchasing power of the men and women who consumed his product, and in the midst of plenty he becomes bankrupt. He becomes bankrupt because he has produced too much at a high profit. His iron slaves, which have made him wealthy, have not purchased one pennyworth of the output of his factory. Neither have his discharged flesh and blood men, who were once his employees, but who are now a part of the great army of unemployed and whose support is a drain upon all charitably-minded people, thus making it impossible for them to purchase as much of the product of the factory as they would otherwise have been able to do. The goose that laid the golden egg has committed suicide, and instead of our having what we ought to have, happy homes and comfortable firesides, we have misery and desolation and want. All of this has come about because there has been no adjustment of profits. The consumer has not received his share, the laboring man has not received his, and the owner of the factory has found that his very success, counted in a purely financial way, has brought about his own ruin.

What are we going to do about it? Are we going to sit idly by and see our society and our civilization, of which we have boasted during all our lives, thus crushed and driven into chaos and oblivion, or are we going to make an attempt to discover the evils of our system and to remedy them? A large class of our people honestly and conscientiously believe that we should do nothing. They say we have had depressions before, and that if we keep our hands off and let everything take its natural course, in time things will remedy themselves upon a new basis, and that we will build up again and go forward as we have done in the past. Undoubtedly, if we make no attempt at improvement matters will in time readjust themselves on a new basis, and after years of suffering and disappointment society will again straighten itself out, and prosperity of some kind will replace the disasters of the present, but it will be on a new basis.

There is no doubt but what, if we let matters float and do nothing to save the situation, when a new adjustment takes place, the property of the country will be owned by a much smaller part of the people than own it now. The farmer and the laboring man will lose their homes, our lands will be tilled by peasants, and the aristocratic, moneyed class, living perhaps in luxury upon the toil of their employees, will own the property of the country. The laborers will not own their homes—they will be tenants. The farmers will be renters; and the tribute, in both cases, will be paid to "those who toil not, neither do they spin."

In reaching this conclusion, we are assuming that the farmers and the laborers of the country will submit to the change which we have outlined, and that they will accept the result and become peasants and toilers without homes and with but little hope. This assumption is erroneous; our farmers will never become peasants, our laborers will never become toilers like the toilers of Russia under the rule of the czars. Our people are too well educated. They have tasted too often of human freedom; and before these readjustments could be brought about we would be plunged into a revolution which would be greater and more calamitous and more cruel than any revolution which has ever taken place in the history of the world. The pendulum would swing so far in the other direction that the property and property rights throughout the country would be destroyed, and on the ruins of our civilization there would be built up some system of control, some system of government, that in the wildest stretch of our imagination we could not properly picture.

It is evident that if we want to save our civilization, if we want to save our system of government, we must do something now, and we must be willing to suffer the disastrous changes which must take place in order to save it. If we decide, as it seems to me all liberty-loving people ought to decide, that an heroic attempt must be made to save us from the catastrophe of a revolutionary condition, the question then presents itself, "What must we do?"

Let us go back to our illustration. When the owner of the factory discharged 500 men and replaced them with 500 iron slaves which he owned, the profit he thereby made should have been divided between the other two classes interested in his factory. He should have reduced the price to the consumers and increased the wages of those of his flesh-and-blood men still in his employ. Not only should he have increased their wages but he should have limited the hours of labor. Instead of working the men 8 hours a day, he should have worked them 6, or 5, or 4, depending upon the amount of the output. Perhaps the output of the factory itself should have been limited and perhaps it will be necessary to limit it in such cases.

If the price to the consumer had been reduced proportionately to the value of the new invention, the consumers would have increased their consumption instead of diminishing it, and this would have resulted in an improvement of living conditions all over the land. No one knows just how much this increase would have been. We have never had an opportunity to test it, but it is conceded by all that the people of the country could consume vastly more food than they have ever consumed under ordinary conditions. They would likewise have utilized and purchased a vast amount of products in all lines useful or beneficial for their comfort. There would have been consumed larger quantities if the price which must be paid could have been decreased to a point where those who produced the product have no more than a reasonable profit for their efforts. A reduction of the hours of labor has been something that society has been concerned with from the beginning of civilization. From the very first invention of labor-saving machinery that was ever made, down to the present time, there has been a constant demand that the hours of labor be reduced in proportion to the improved machinery. There was a time when men and women worked 16 hours a day. By constant agitation, and often after very great difficulty, and much suffering, reductions have taken place from time to time until the universal working day of the present has reached 8 hours. Would it not be better for the world at large, and for all classes of people, if our labor day would be further reduced? As I see it, this must come. Unless we solve it peacefully, it will come in a way which will bring suffering and disaster in its wake. Why is it not desirable to decrease the hours of labor, and increase the hours of the people to be devoted to education and human enjoyment? If the necessary labor of the country can be performed in 6 hours instead of 8, why should such a change not take place, and why should it not be a blessing rather than an injury? If it were not for the selfishness which prevails in the hearts and minds of so many of our people, people of great wealth and influence, such a change would come without irritation.

The development of any kind of machinery ought to be hailed as a blessing. If properly handled, it would be a blessing rather than a curse. Our men of wealth and our men of power ought to realize that when they oppose such movements which are natural, they are only impeding the progress of humanity and holding back the natural progress of the world. You can dam up a stream, and hold back the current by artificial means, but the time will come when any man-made construction must give way to the unyielding laws of God, and if man impedes the progress, he only adds to the difficulties which come when the rising stream goes over the dam and carries it away.

The owner of the factory who retained to himself practically all of the additional profit on account of the employment of iron, lifeless men, perhaps violated no law of man. He committed no crime against any edict of our society as now constituted, but he did violate a natural law of common justice, and nature's laws cannot be violated by any human being, however great and however powerful, without some time, some place, somewhere, someone must suffer the penalty of such a violation.

But what are the objections to limiting the hours of labor? "Unconstitutional," cries the lawyer for monopolies and big businesses. "It prevents me from pursuing my occupation of securing unlimited profits," shouts the man who is a worshiper at the golden shrine. "It interferes with my personal liberty," exclaim the millions of honest-minded, conscientious citizens. Our Constitution was framed by our patriotic forefathers in a world where no such condition existed. Not by the wildest flight of imagination can we suppose they ever conceived the condition which now confronts their descendants. The laws and edicts made under one condition of society must bend and change according to the divine law of human progress, and must be construed and enforced in the light of conditions existing under the changed circumstances of civilization if such a change exists. Whether we wish it or not, even if we are so selfish as to be satisfied with present conditions, our ideas and our judgments must give way to the inevitable law of human progress.

The right to acquire property and make unlimited profits is not a sacred right. The laws which gave this permission were framed in accordance with the conditions then existing, and when changes in economic conditions occur, regardless of the wish or the demand of man, and especially when these rights, if continued, will bring about the destruction of government and civilization, then new laws and new rules must be enforced to protect the rights of humanity and save our civilization from annihilation.

That the personal liberty of individuals will be modified and somewhat changed by such laws and rules cannot be denied, but personal liberty of man is always a relative one, and he cannot exercise this liberty in a way which is destructive of the rights of his fellow man. These liberties can and ought to be curtailed, modified, and circumscribed, if such action is necessary for the protection of society in general. Every form of government implies certain curtailment of personal liberty. Without such curtailment we could have no government, and as our civilization becomes more complex and as new and heretofore unknown elements enter into the proposition, the personal rights of individuals must give way to the human rights of people generally which are necessary for the perpetuation of any government or any form of society.

But it will be found that this modification of these rights and these liberties, which are so jealously guarded and so strenuously upheld, will bring to all honest-minded and liberty-loving people additional blessings and additional happiness which will more than compensate for any imaginary or real sacrifice which is made. Those who object to any change in our laws or our civilization ought to remember that these changes and modifications are necessary to preserve the governmental fabric, without which there is nothing left but uncertain chaos. If those who object to the necessary changes have their way, they will ultimately find that instead of losing a part of their cherished rights and liberties they will have to sacrifice all and take their chances as to what will be the outcome of the universal destruction of human society as it now exists.

Their very stubbornness, if successful, will destroy their Constitution, their Government, and their civilization, which they are so anxious to preserve. They will be in the attitude of the proverbial horse whose owner undertook to teach him to live without eating. Just as he was about to announce the success of his experiment, the poor animal died.

I am not claiming, however, that this change will not involve some sacrifice. We will have to give up some of our cherished ideas about the rights of property if we want to preserve the higher and more human principle of the rights of man. About all that is necessary is to put some humanity into our statute books. It is but natural that the man of independent mind—honest and conscientious, but independent and jealous of every right he possesses—should object to the changes which so far, in the centuries of our civilization, have not been found to be necessary.

These men, however, forget that the progress of humanity from barbarism to civilization has been one of continuous controversy. Improvement in the arts, improvement in science, and improvement in government have always been bitterly opposed by a large portion of the people. Every step in advancement this old world has ever made has been made after a contest, sometimes a bitter contest upon the field of battle. The leaders in every contest toward higher civilization have had to blaze their way through an unknown wilderness, sometimes of doubt and uncertainty, and in this great battle for the rights of common man and for the further up-building of humanity opposition will be met at every step. This opposition will be composed not only of men and women who are moved by reasons which are entirely selfish but in their ranks will also be found millions of honest men and women who do not realize that these changes must be brought about in order to save our civilization from destruction. We have reached a point where the rights of property as heretofore existing are often in direct conflict with the rights of man, and although selfish-minded men may ask in derision, "Am I my brother's keeper?" nevertheless the answer from millions of struggling mortals, bowed down in suffering and misery by the injustice of monopoly and selfishness, will cry out in answer, and their answer will be echoed from mountain top to plain and from ocean to ocean, "You are your brother's keeper", and I might add, "if you would drive wicked selfishness from out of your hearts, you would enjoy the job." Nothing is so conducive to human happiness as to do something for the alleviation of someone more unfortunate than yourself. This does not necessarily mean that you should make a contribution in money. Neither is it necessary that you should have some particular unfortunate individual in mind. You can accomplish this when you are exercising the sovereign right of a citizen in casting your ballot for men and measures which, in your heart, you believe to be proper instruments in carrying out the principles of righteousness.

It may mean the raising of your voice in defense of those who have been unjustly treated, even under the guise of law. It may mean the use of your influence in supporting men who are engaged in the performance of public duty where the rights of man are at stake. It may mean the establishment of a conscience in government as well as the application of the principle in ordinary society, but in all cases it will bring happiness and contentment greater to those who give, greater to those who help, than to the unfortunate ones whose rights are thus protected.

When it is evident that labor working 8 hours a day, with the machinery of modern times, produces more than can be consumed, the very life of our civilization will cry out and demand a law which shall limit the hours of labor, even though the employer desires his men to work longer hours, and even though the laborer himself is claiming the inalienable right to work as long as he pleases. If the result of a rule is injurious to society and endangers its life, then society has the right, and ought, with the strong hand of law, if necessary, prohibit such labor. If we desire to preserve our civilization intact, we must take the necessary steps to bring about such preservation, and where such action infringes upon the rights of those who are seeking unlimited wealth, the rights of society must prevail and the rights of property must be submissive.

All the remedies which have been suggested, and all those which are being tried, are mostly directed toward emergency relief. The emergency is great—it is unparalleled. Never in the history of the world has anything like it existed before. However, these measures are not enough to solve the permanent difficulty. Practically all of these emergency measures require the expenditure of large amounts of money, all of which must be borne by the taxpayers. Under ordinary conditions most of these expenditures would be entirely unjustifiable, but it is apparent that the emergency must be met, and that our entire governmental fabric would be destroyed unless it is met. Our condition has come about because, in the years which have passed, we have not seen that we were violating nature's laws in permitting the accumulation of huge monopolies where the profits of human labor and human toil went in unfair proportions to those who own the wealth and property of the country, thus enabling larger fortunes to be accumulated and greater monopolies to be formed. We are met face to face with the result, and we are realizing more every day that selfish ambition to accumulate money must be curbed by law. We are all somewhat to blame for the conditions in which we find ourselves. We have lived, especially since the unjustified World War, in a universe where the only ambition of man seems to be to acquire money, to get more gold, and to obtain a larger share of the property of the country.

All along the pathway of history there stand the tombstones of dead governments because the people failed to preserve the rights of man as against the rights of property, and to protect the weak against the oppression of the powerful. They permitted those whose only ambition was gold to follow their occupation, unrestrained and unchecked. There is no reason to believe that our Government is an exception to that inflexible law. The unreasonable accumulation of money and the ultimate ownership of the property of the country in the hands of a few is now, by the leading economists of the world, admitted to be dangerous to the perpetuity of any government. It is the greatest stumbling block in civilization, and, like our illustration, it will eventually destroy itself.

This ambition is, to a great extent, almost a disease. Man has forgotten the duty he owes to humanity in his mad rush for wealth, and yet the warning is written on the canopy of heaven. It would be well if we should pause and hesitate before our Government, under the baneful influence of this great evil, is destroyed and added to the dead nations of the world. The cemetery of nations is already crowded with tombstones that mark the decay of nations which died because they forgot that the rights of men were superior to the rights of property. As a permanent remedy we ought not only to shorten the hours of toil and labor but we ought to limit the right of wealth to entail itself from one generation to another. A progressive inheritance tax which would make it impossible for the property of one generation to be passed on intact to the people of a succeeding generation would, without injury to any living soul, go far to bring us a permanent remedy. Such a tax could be collected with less hardship than any other tax ever conceived by man. It injures no one. It is the least burdensome of all forms of taxation, and would make it impossible for the dangers confronting us now to confront our posterity. It will add to human happiness and not add one mite of grief or pain to anyone.

Such a tax should allow a liberal exemption—an exemption even large enough so that the beneficiary might live the balance of his life in luxury—and then it should be increased by progressive steps so that the residue of the fortune could be passed back to the people through this method of taxation, and thus be returned to the Government, whose laws made it possible for the fortune to be acquired. Such a tax, like Portia's mercy, would be twice blessed. It would be a blessing to the taxpayer whose burdens would thus, to some extent, be removed, and it would be a blessing to humanity by making it impossible for swollen fortunes and monopolistic combinations, by their powerful influence, to perform acts of injustice either to the governments or to individuals.

I make no complaint against wealth as such. There are many wealthy men who have accumulated their property with perfect honesty, and without injustice or injury to any of their fellow men, and who are handling their fortunes with real philanthropy, but even to these men there is no injustice in such a tax. The man who has accumumulated great wealth ought not to object, if when he is dead and when it is impossible for him to longer use or enjoy his money a portion of his great fortune should be turned over to the Government under whose laws he has been protected in its accumulation. There is no inherent right in any man to make any disposition of his property after he is dead. It is only because the statutes of the country permit this to be done that he is able to have anything to say regarding his fortune after he has passed on. If those dependent upon him or those who are near and dear to him and to whom he has bequeathed a portion of his fortune are permitted, under the law, without the payment of any tax. to receive portions even large enough to keep them in luxury during their lifetime, there is no just reason why he should complain. It is not because of any ill will towards an individual that such a tax is demanded. It is assessed on the theory that the accumulation of the property or the money of any country in the hands of a comparatively few men is injurious to society, and a drawback upon the progress of humanity.

Neither can we close our eyes to the disclosures which have been made from time to time of the unreasonable power wielded by men of great wealth, and the wicked and inhuman way in which these men have tried to control even the policies of our Federal Government. They use their financial power not only to increase their own wealth to an unreasonable extent, but to avoid the ordinary support of government which they honestly owe.

Recent disclosures have shown that some of our leading alleged financiers (please note I said "alleged"), men whose word in the financial world was law, have been found guilty of the most disgraceful practice of questionable, and even dishonest, efforts to cheat the Government out of the income tax which they honestly and legally owe.

It is not only the loss of revenue which honestly belongs to the Government, but the example which they set to their fellow men that has a degenerating and baneful influence, the full limit of which even staggers the imagination to fully comprehend. What does the ordinary man think when he realizes that the men controlling the finances of our country, and even of the world are guilty of offenses which, if practiced by an ordinary person in the ordinary walks of life, would drive the perpetrator in disgrace out of the folds of decent society? Who can measure the numberless instances where common men, whose families are suffering for the very necessities of life, are driven to desperation and crime by the example set by these men of great wealth? Who can tell the injury society in general suffers from such unworthy and dishonest methods practiced by men who enjoy a national reputation as great financiers? How can we measure the loss of confidence in our Government when men at the bottom begin to realize that the financiers at the top are so disreputable and dishonest—that they are men who do not hesitate to resort to indefensible methods to avoid the payment of a tax in support of the Government under whose laws they have been enabled to amass these great fortunes? Such men do more injury to the stability of our governmental institutions and do more to drag down in disgrace the Government itself than the highway robber who has the courage to commit his crimes upon the public streets in broad daylight. Would a law be unjust which would prevent such men from passing on their ill-gotten gains to others where the entailed fortune would be used either in the same way, or in other ways to oppress their fellow men?

After all, what is the object of government? Our forefathers said in that immortal declaration that the objects of government were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Life and liberty are included in the pursuit of happiness; and, so, if our forefathers were right, we can put it all in one sentence: "The object of government is to protect the happiness of the people comprising the Government." This definition of government, although proclaimed by our forefathers more than a century ago, has never been questioned anywhere by anyone. If the object of government is the happiness of the people in the Government, then it follows that there must be some humanity in government. It must become a religion—a religion that does not consider the conditions which may exist beyond the grave but confines its consideration to happiness in this life. The government which is the most successful is the government which gives to its people the greatest amount of contentment and happiness. Such a government means a government of home owners; it means that farms shall be tilled by men who own the land; and it means that they shall have a recompense, fair and honest, to pay them for their toil, while they are producing the food we eat and the material which makes the clothing necessary for the comfort of man. It means that the laborer must receive a fair compensation for the products produced by the sweat of his face, and in addition he must be able to lay by enough to care for him in comfort and peace in his old age. It means that property must be satisfied with a smaller percentage of the product of the toil of man augmented by the production of mechanical machinery. It means that those who toil and those who labor must have more leisure time; they must be better educated; they must spend more time at their firesides, enjoying the association of their wives and their little ones. All this does not mean any injury to those who own large amounts of property. In fact, it gives them a protection they cannot get for their property in any other way.

A satisfied citizenship is necessary either in the preservation of the rights of man, or in the protection of the rights of property. A nation of happy, prosperous, satisfied people means the protection of society, it means the protection of the rights of man, and likewise and to the same extent it means the protection of the rights of property. The man of great wealth has no other genuine hope for the protection of his accumulated wealth.

Respect for law is one of the requisites of a stable government. It is in a government where the people live in their own homes, where the farmers are getting a profitable price for their product, where the toiler in the workshop is getting an honest wage, and is laboring under decent, respectable conditions, that the rights of man and the rights of property are both preserved in every legitimate respect. Where these conditions do not exist, and where men of great wealth themselves show that they are dishonest in their financial transactions, neither human liberty nor property is safe from injury by the mob.

The difficulties which, therefore, we are faced with at the present time, and the dangers which confront us, if we meet them fairly and honestly, and with a supreme desire to so shape things as to increase the happiness of all people, will fade away and we will find that all that is necessary is to be honest with our fellow men, and to give equality to all people alike, and that by so doing, instead of these difficulties, and these dangers, being a menace, they will, if we thus meet them, and thus solve them, become a blessing to all humanity, and in that day, which I hope is not far distant, there will be placed upon willing shoulders the new responsibilities of the new civilization.

FIGHT ON SECURITIES ACT—ARTICLE BY BERNARD FLEXNER

As in legislative session,

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, various Members of Congress have received this morning, by mail, an advance reprint of an article which is to appear in the February Atlantic Monthly, entitled "The Fight on the Securities Act." Its author is Mr. Bernard Flexner, an attorney of unusual and long experience in handling corporation affairs and as an adviser of investment bankers on investment securities. The article is a devastating reply to the lobby now reported to be engaged in an effort to emasculate the securities law enacted at the last session of Congress. That law, it will be remembered, was the first important legislative result of the pending stock-exchange investigation by the Senate Banking and Currency Committee. Mr. Flexner's discussion is so comprehensive, convincing, and, on the whole, important that the editor of the Atlantic Monthly should be commended for his public spirit in making this timely contribution available at once to Members of the Congress. In addition, so that it may be available for more general distribution, I have asked and received the consent of the Atlantic Monthly to have Mr. Flexner's article incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. This I now ask unanimous leave to have done.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Special advance reprint from the Atlantic Monthly for February 1934]

THE FIGHT ON THE SECURITIES ACT

By Bernard Flexner

A personal word by way of preface to forestall the criticism that what I shall say is more of the stuff that has been said or written by men who know little or nothing of the securities business. I am not an amateur; I am a lawyer familiar with shares of stock, bonds, debentures, warrants, options, and the innumerable other pieces of paper. During 25 years I have supervised issues of securities by the company; I have passed on the legal details for investment bankers of the issues of millions of senior securities of public-utility operating companies; and also, alas, I have been an investor.

The views I express here I know from personal conversations to be the views of many lawyers and bankers in New York's Wall Street who are as disgusted as any farmer or small business man in the far interior with the revelations before the Senate investigating committee. But these men feel that the Street has much to offer in honest financial guidance to the industrial and commercial community. They see that the methods of distributing securities as heretofore carried on must be reformed; that the conditions which have already ruined half of the investment banking houses will ruin the rest if they continue; and that the investment banker has got to be satisfied with smaller profits than he has made heretofore. They are aware that the country at large is now thoroughly suspicious of and effectively angry with the Street to a degree never before known—and that, for the first time in all its history of conflict with the country as a whole, the Street has not produced leaders astute enough to defend it intelligently. With enlightened self-interest, therefore, they realize that Wall Street cannot expect to continue as a stable institution in which they can make even a modestly comfortable livelihood at the work that interests them except by assuring the rest of the country of the kind of honesty in securities flotation and financial management which the Securities Act enjoins.

Because of jobs, connections, the friendships that men curiously acquire with others of different ethical standards, or hopeless cynicism, these individuals do not dare or choose to be publicly critical. This article calls the bluff on an ugly campaign of propaganda and very regretfully has to be equally ugly in calling a spade a spade. But when I speak of the Street—meaning not only Wall Street, but State, La Salle, Montgomery, South Broad, and Carondelet—I refer only to the dominant class in the Street. In no way do I impugn the intelligence or motives of the multitude of silent nonconformists, many of whom, I know, would like to sign this article with me.

I

Last June the Securities Act passed both Houses of Congress without a dissenting vote. A few months later the cocksure lawyers of the Street's banking house, who never before had had difficulty in finding a way around legislation regulating business, discovered that the act was substantially lawyerproof. Then began a well-subsidized campaign of propaganda against the act to force its abolition under guise of amendment. This campaign, led by members of certain well-known New York law firms, has been based on the wildest exaggeration. For the first time since the stupid fight the Street made in 1913 against the adoption of its now beloved Federal Reserve System, the acumen of its legal henchmen in demonstrating to courts how little a statute should mean has been put into reverse to demonstrate to Congress how awfully too much a statute could mean.

The campaign has now reached a point of pressure where there are intimations that it may succeed in opening up the act for amendment at this session of Congress.

One fact should be bluntly understood at the outset of any discussion of this subject. The Street's sugar-coated purpose, as the public has been given to understand it, is to persuade Congress to pass just a few comparatively minor amendments to the act to make it workable and to remove unnecessary interferences with business. As to the broad objectives of the act, all its opponents say that they agree in principle. But every realistic believer in these objectives knows that the real hope and purpose of these helpful friends in wanting to open up the act for amendment is to take full advantage of any opportunity that may present itself in the accidents of the legislative process to destroy its effectiveness completely. Too much money and effort have gone into this campaign of propaganda to justify a purpose of mere clarifying amendments. Amendments which appear innocent enough will be artfully loaded with ingenious weasel words; seemingly casual changes from section to section will attempt to confuse the careful interrelations which give the act its lawyerproof quality.

II

The steady stream of propaganda takes two main lines of attack. One is a general technical raking over of the act to suggest the uncertainties or injustices of its application to extreme supposititious cases. This approach helps to divert attention from the fundamental social issues at stake, on which the public can see eye to eye with the defenders of the act, to innumerable squabbles over technical detail in which the public won't know where to side. Eminent financial law firms in New York and elsewhere, whose members feel no particular necessity to make their legal opinions fit a purpose of attack upon the act, consider such technical objections laughably ridiculous. Quietly and privately they have advised their banking clients to operate under the act with the assurance that, as a practical matter, it exacts no more of the directors and bankers of an issuer than can fairly be expected under a combination of common law and a decent standard of securities ethics.

The second method of attack, really insidious, appears as a practical argument for economic revival in this period of emergency. Whether or not the act, in vacuo, is fair or unfair, whether or not it is socially expedient from the long-term point of view, the act must be abolished, at least temporarily, because otherwise the bankers and company directors simply will not give necessary cooperation to the President's plans for recovery. The argument amplifies thus:

Admitting that the methods of marketing securities used prior to the passage of the act have mulcted the public of an amazing proportion of the sum invested;

Admitting that leopards do not change their spots and that, if left unregulated, the securities business will mulct the public again in precisely the same way;

Nevertheless,

(a) There can be no fundamental recovery until there is substantial reemployment in the so-called "capital goods" industries;

(b) There is no way to revive such employment without supplying the purchasers from the capital-goods industries with new funds through the flotation of securities in the ancient public-mulcting manner;

(c) Whether or not justified, directors and underwriters are, as a pragmatic fact, on strike against risking the liabilities imposed by the act;

(d) That strike is preventing new securities issues;

(e) If the act and the strike against it disappear, new flotations of securities will, within a period that will mark the difference between continued depression and immediate recovery, supply those who want to buy new capital goods with funds sufficient to give enough orders to the capital-goods industries to absorb their unemployed;

(f) The loss by investors and the loss of all the social purposes of the act are a necessary—and cheap—price to pay for the certain recovery which will follow.

But even a member of counsel for J. P. Morgan & Co., one of the severest critics of the act, says frankly in Barron's Weekly for November 6, "It is still too early to prove conclusively with figures either that it is or is not the fault of the act that no American companies of any size are doing any capital financing."

There is a famine of new securities. But the truth about that is:

(1) For a variety of fundamental economic reasons, which the Securities Act in no way caused and a recurrence of which it is designed ultimately to prevent, there was not before the adoption of the act, there is not now, and there may not be for some time, any investment demand for long-term industrial obligations of the ordinary type at a bearable rate of interest to the issuer.

(2) Whenever there has been a market—as there has been, for instance, in the distillery and mining shares, which at the present moment are popularly considered to hold great speculative possibilities—issues have been offered and directors and banking houses have taken the risks of the Securities Act in spite of all its supposed terrors.

(3) Refunding operations are being deliberately and uneconomically delayed with the help of short-time bank loans, not only because of the unsatisfactory condition of the long-time money market, but also because of the illusory hope, deliberately fostered by Wall Street to create a lack of refunding operations as an argument against the act, that the act will be repealed by amendment shortly after the 1st of January.

As reasonable corollaries, it seems fairly certain that, however regretfully, the risks of the act will be taken (1) by the bankers, when long-term industrial bonds for purchases of new capital goods or refundings can be floated by them at a profit, and (2) by those directors of companies who, as stockholders or otherwise, feel a genuine interest in their companies when, with the hope of repeal of the act gone, they face the alternative of taking the risks of refunding or of defaulting their companies' maturities. To be sure, there is the type of director who will not undertake the burden of mere due care and competence required of him under the act—the inevitable lawyers who should be professional advisers and not directors, the scenic directors who "dress" the annual report to the stockholders, the observers representing short interests who are only on the board to get inside information. These, just as they threaten to do, will not take the risks and will get out, and the companies and an honest business society will be the better for their going.

Fundamental economic factors against an immediate, long-term, nonspeculative capital market certainly include—

From the borrower's side:

(1) The shrinkage of the credit-worthiness of many companies according to normal investment standards;

(2) Unwillingness, after the harrowing experience with debt in the last 5 years, to finance with new debt at exorbitant rates;

(3) Sheer lack of national need for general industrial plant expansion at anywhere near the rate of the last decade; on the whole, as the President has pointed out, the Nation's capital equipment is already built.

From the lender's side:

(1) Fear, however little justified, as to the long-term value of the dollar;

(2) The drying up of institutional investment because of the troubles of insurance companies, banks, building and loan associations, etc.—possibly the permanent loss of the market once provided by the secondary reserve bond account of commercial and savings banks;

(3) The drying up of private savings out of which came the great aggregate of investment by small investors;

(4) The gun-shy attitude of investors with funds, who are themselves on strike against the bankers, and who want at any price the safety that can be found only in Government obligations.

These factors—and not a legal confirmation of an ethical standard that men who use other people's money must be honest and competent—have dried up the securities market. No securities act interferes with short-term customers' loans by banks. Yet, even under Government urging, there has been no substantial credit expansion in this field. When lenders will not lend, nor borrowers borrow, for a period of more than a few months or weeks, what reason is there to expect that long-term open-market lending will immediately boom after the repeal of the act?

Even counting the rush to get issues under the wire before the act became effective on July 27, there was little more financing in March, April, May, June, and July than in August, September, October, and November.

Railroad and municipal securities are exempt from registration under the act. (They are within its scope only to give a buyer relief against his immediate seller who misrepresents securities.) But there have been no issues of railroad securities offered to the public since the operation of the act, and only a few municipal issues even by municipalities of the very highest credit rating. Railroads and municipalities alike are financing themselves as best they can through the Federal Government. Where refinancing is not possible through the Government, they simply default.

However much economists may decry an overbuilt industrial plant as a whole, it is in these very fields of railway and municipal finance that the need of new capital investment is really pressing. Competent observers estimate that the railroads could profitably expend well over $1,000,000,000 for new equipment and deferred maintenance. Despite all the political inadvisabilities of becoming further involved in the railroads, however, the Government is being driven by the force of circumstances to offer them funds in generous amounts for capital expenditures through the Public Works Administration and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation—and even for refinancings, where the Government has no incentive to lend to create work. All this simply because the bankers cannot raise the money. And it is not only the perennially bankrupt roads that are coming to the Government. The Pennsylvania—a credit risk comparable to that of any industrial company which might presently contemplate new capital issues—has applied to the Government for equipment and construction loans aggregating approximately $85,000,000 to carry out its electrification program. Certainly this would be a juicy issue for private distribution if it could be distributed. In view of the ingrained prejudices of the great banking houses against Government interference in any kind of business, this financing of the railroads by the Government has enormous significance.

Again, the inability to float municipal bonds is not confined to bankrupt municipalities. Few public bonds stand on a better basis than those of the Port of New York Authority, operator of great bridges and of the famous Holland Tunnels. It serves the busiest harbor in the world and is backed by the moral obligation of the two rich States of New York and New Jersey. The authority has already floated $140,000,000 of bonds. But it, too, after months of argument as to terms, during which there was plenty of time and incentive for private financing if it could be had, has come to the Government for a loan of approximately $40,000,000 to build a new tunnel under the Hudson River.

The city of San Francisco, with its excellent credit standing and with tax delinquencies among the lowest in the country, recently attempted to sell $13,500,000 of bonds for public improvement. The only private banking syndicate which was interested bid on a 6-percent basis. This bid was denounced as "unconscionable" and, "to say the least, one of noncooperation in the recovery program" by Secretary Ickes, who had offered the city on behalf of the Public Works Administration a 30-percent grant of the cost of the improvement.

If the bankers, unhampered by the Securities Act, are unable to take care of the needs of public bodies and railways, their wail about issues stopped by the act cannot be taken seriously. The Street has never met the challenge that it refer by chapter and verse to expenditures for new capital goods that have been stopped by the act. Here and there, perhaps, the refunding of an industrial maturity that was not immediately due, or that could for a short time be carried on a bank loan, may possibly have been rendered temporarily impracticable because the bankers or the company's directors were frightened, not by the act, but by the absurd gloss that Wall Street lawyers have put upon the act. But—and this is a big but—the squawking over refundings is a patent bluff. Despite all the ominous predictions that defaults would occur, no default actually has occurred! As for the list of imminent refundings totaling $1,500,000,000 which the act is charged with preventing, even a superficial examination of the securities and of their low quotations will convince one that many of these companies will not be able to refund in any event; unless they have a miraculous improvement in earnings they will have to reorganize.

There is, therefore, no proved causal relation between the Securities Act and the lack of capital issues in the last 6 months. All the hair-tearing over the act is based upon a guess as to what bankers and directors would do if conditions were satisfactory from their point of view except for the act. But a guess that bankers will not spurn their profits and that directors will not default their maturities when the capital market will take their issues is a lot closer to the hard-boiled common sense of the Street than a guess that all bankers will sulk forever poor, and that all directors will abandon the many things they get out of a corporation besides their fees and go home.

III

The real issue is not whether the act could be made to look prettier on paper, but whether, within only 8 months of its passage and in the midst of a general Wall Street attack upon the new deal, the act should be opened up for amendment by this Congress. That entails grave questions of legislative policy and particularly of new-deal policy. The act stands as a symbol, promising a better and freer economic world. Before the sheer power of a well-financed campaign of sabotage is permitted to slash into it, the burden of proof is on the opposition to show not merely that it is uncomfortable for them and their kind—for it was intended to be that—but that it constitutes an immediate, unbearable burden upon desirable elements in the country.

The Securities Act was perhaps more carefully worked over than any other product of the first new-deal Congress. It is not a doctrinaire brainstorm. It is carefully based upon the solid foundation of British experience with the English Companies Act, which, in turn, is the evolution of years. In substance, the Securities Act, is the English Companies Act, modified to come within the constitutional power of the Federal Legislature to regulate interstate commerce, and to recognize the fact that in England, except for a very unusual Hatry or Kylsant, the distribution of securities is a decorous, traditional business, offering its wares only to institutions and wary family solicitors, while in the United States it has been a high-pressure racket that jangled every housewife's doorbell.

The act itself was under consideration in Congress for more than 2 months. The extraordinarily able House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and the chief of the legislative drafting bureau in the House studied it, phrase by phrase, section by section, for nearly a full month. Every objection now made to it was, at some time in this long process, raised, considered, and deliberately rejected.

Any statute adopted after such careful consideration—unless it really seriously and provably throws things out of joint—should be given a fair trial period of at least a couple of years. It needs to be shaped by administrative rulings and court decisions into a practical instrument before being generally revised by the legislature. This caution is particularly applicable to a statute which deals with such a bewilderingly multiplicious and technical field as the Securities Act, where application to the specific situations which touch the public depend almost more on administrative rulings than on the words of the statute itself.

The unavoidably necessary complications of the act and its subject matter are in themselves very important reasons for not permitting the Street to scramble it by amendment at this session of Congress. Those who have not worked with the machinery for distributing securities cannot be expected to understand its many intricacies and devices. The average citizen does not comprehend how thorough and ingenious is the protective technique in the creation of new evasions which constant experience with emasculation of State and Federal statutes has developed in the Wall Street lawyer. Indeed, the whole technique, training, and tradition of the Wall Street lawyer is centered, not upon conformity with the law but upon finding a way to get around it—a technique which, until the adoption of the Securities Act, was as a practical matter undefeatable. The necessity of caulking all the chinks to balk this expert mechanism of evasion made the problem of drafting the act extremely difficult. To avoid those opportunities for evasion which always climb out of the scope of the law up ladders of too-specific technicalities, the act had in many places to be couched in broad language which the draftsmen clearly recognized might give rise to difficult border-line cases. Because the adaptability of the securities business to changes in form made it certain that a hole in one section or between sections would be immediately, and exclusively utilized to render the rest of the act worthless, it was necessary to exercise especial care in articulating the several parts of the act into a unified whole.

In a statute which has to be so carefully articulated because it is so certain to become the target of legal sharpshooting, the subtle, casual change of a significant word, phrase, or single short section may open up infinite possibilities of trouble in all the rest of the act.

Every generous dollar-a-year suggestion made by the lobbyists of the Street has upon examination proved to open up—sometimes subtly, sometimes crudely, but always under the guise of improved workability in some important feature of the act—a hole through which a coach and four could be driven. And once a hole is made almost anywhere in the act, through which financing can be carried on free of its liabilities, the entire purpose of the act is lost, since the legal ingenuity of the Street may confidently be relied upon to find a way to put all financing of any kind through this one hole.

Consider, for example, the innocent-looking suggestion to eliminate section 15—the very heart of the act—which holds liable any person controlling any other person who is liable under the act. The reason advanced for this proposed change is that it is always difficult to resolve border-line cases of what constitutes "control." But such an elimination would practically repeal the act, by the simple device of organizing judgment-proof subsidiaries, all flotations could be effected by the real parties in interest with complete escape from the liabilities of the act. And let no one suppose that none but the fly-by-nights would take advantage of such an opportunity! When the device of the holding company was discovered to avoid the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon railroad consolidations under the Transportation Act of 1920, even J. P. Morgan & Co., and Kuhn, Loeb & Co., and their ultradistinguished counsel pushed through that hole with Alleghany and Pennroad Corporation, respectively.

It becomes clear, then, that no matter how carefully the defenders of the Securities Act may study the formal proposals for amendment offered in congressional committee by the banking lawyers, a change of a phrase or of a word or two—well prepared and deceptively simplified with the art that conceals art—may seriously injure the fundamental purposes of the law. And if such proposals should be thrown into the hurried last moments of a committee hearing with the help of a sympathetic member of the committee, or offered as an amendment from the floor in the hurly-burly of debate, the surprised defenders of the act would not have time enough to guard against ulterior subtleties. The mere opening up of the act for "minor" amendments, therefore, will in itself be a great victory for those who want to reestablish the good old days of Wall Street's gold-plated anarchy.

Under such circumstances, it is beside the point to charge congressional leaders with pig-headed stubbornness in maintaining that this legislation should not, at the present moment, be subjected to even minor amendments. Theirs is the grim and realistic understanding that the opposition may—and if the chance offered, undoubtedly would—go dangerously far in following through the most innocent beginnings of an opening-up process. If this be challenged as an unfair attitude to take, one can only reply that Wall Street has brought this distrust upon its own head. The outside observer who has followed the disclosures from the witness stand of the Senate Investigating Committee, and who realizes the stakes now at issue and the impossibility of changing ingrained habits of mind, has no choice but to regard the Street's constructive criticism of reform legislation with prima facie malevolence.

Another strong reason for keeping the act inviolate from Wall Street at this session of Congress is the extreme political unwisdom of permitting a powerful class against whom a reform statute has been directed to weaken it before it has had even a chance to operate. Such an event would serve to convince the public that Wall Street had the future of the law so completely within control that it might safely be treated as a dead letter. Before a reform statute can become really effective its legal rules have to soak into a business community for a long time until practical methods of operation within the rules become business habits. As another writer has put it: "If the act ultimately succeeds, it will not be through any mere compliance with its lettered provisions. Its effects must go deeper. It must reach men's attitudes as to the ends and methods of economic enterprise. The act will never protect the gullible unless it alters the premises of the sophisticated." No reform statute can be expected to have this effect if there hangs over it a constant threat that powerful interests can force changes in it whenever they discover new ways in which it pinches them.

A Congress dealing with reform legislation and opposed by the biggest of big interests, which have always managed to beat their way through reform after reform until that ability has become common knowledge, must remember that once it yields under fire, even on minor matters, the small business community will never believe that the reform has any fundamental stability. There will be no assurance that even its broadest purposes may not be amended from year to year as Wall Street dictates, with the consequences that the Securities Act and the principles of honesty which it embodies will never become part of the accepted business habits of the community.

Indeed, the vehement opposition which the Securities Act has aroused is in itself a completely adequate reason why a new-deal Congress should dig in and hold. This act is the very keystone of the new deal. Together with the Glass-Steagall bill, it was the only permanent reform made in all the amazing last session of Congress. In a peculiar degree it symbolizes the spirit of the new order in its challenge to the old. Almost as important as its actual details will be the demonstration to Wall Street that these details, dictated as they were by the broad general interest of the Nation, cannot be sabotaged by any combination of private interests, however powerful. At this impertinent organized challenge within the first year of the statute, Congress must teach the Street that the new deal can beat its lawyers and its money. Else we have only "scotched the snake, not killed it."

IV

The real point of attack upon the act is its civil-liability provisions. Under these provisions bankers, company directors and officers, accountants, and other experts employed in the distribution of securities are liable to the purchaser if, through willfulness, carelessness, or incompetence, a material misstatement has been made in their published selling story about a security and the security drops below its original offering price with loss to the purchaser. The details of registering the security with the Federal Trade Commission, the waiting period before the public offering which deflates high-pressure salesmanship, the risks of a stop order by the Commission after sale begins, are unfortunate and irksome, but tolerable. The criminal provisions do not matter. But the idea that the purchaser of a security gone bad can sue the seller to take it back and return the money violates every rule of business that the Street ever heard of.

This outrageous liability is the real nub of the objections to the act under the smoke-screen of all the other objections; this touches the pocket nerve! But it also happens to represent the principle of "seller beware", which the President particularly wanted the act to add to the crude old common-law maxim of "buyer beware." A banker or corporation director expects his Rolls-Royce dealer to take back from him a limousine not of the kind or quality it was represented to be; but for his customer to ask him to take back sour securities is sheer cheek. Is there, then, something akin to sovereign immunity in the securities game?

Now, what are the liabilities imposed on the seller of securities by the Securities Act and by the British Companies Act with which it is so often compared?

Both acts demand a statement describing the securities to be sold, and in the statement certain specified information is required. Under the American act this is called the registration statement and has to be filed with the Federal Trade Commission 20 days before the security can be offered for sale to the public. Under the British act this basic statement is called the prospectus. Wall Street claims that the American registration statement requires too much. It wants to know about a lot of "trivial, gossipy details", such as bonuses, preferred lists, secret commissions, the interests of bankers, directors, and large stockholders in inside deals with their companies; it also insists on going into the accounts of plant and property depreciation back to 1922 in order to reconcile the ingenious figures offered the Bureau of Internal Revenue since that time.

It cannot be too often repeated that after the registration statement is filed, no liability of anyone to a purchaser of a security arises under the American act unless that registration statement "contained an untrue statement of a material fact or omitted to state a material fact required to be stated or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading." Not until a defendant is prima facie guilty, therefore, does he come within the possibility of being liable. The words "material fact" are taken verbatim from the English act. The language concerning omission to state a material fact is a spelling out in the American act of the interpretation of the scope of "untrue statement of material fact" which British courts construing the British act have made in the celebrated Lord Kylsant case and others.

What is a material fact? The interpretation of this language in the American act will of course follow that of the English act from which it was copied. The English courts have interpreted "material fact"—following the recommendation of Lord Davey's Committee in the report to Parliament which laid the basis for the British Act of 1900—as a fact "which could reasonably influence the mind of an investor of average prudence"; that is, something really important.

The objection is sometimes made that such a definition is not sufficiently concrete—that corporation directors and bankers cannot feel comfortable until the act is amended to say "only this and this and this are the material facts which you have to tell the investor." The act does try, so far as is humanly possible, to meet this self-distrust of judgment and disinclination to make a frank disclosure of essential facts. It painstakingly enumerates in detail in Schedules A and B the kinds of facts which the registration statement is required to cover. And no other facts, even if they might otherwise be considered material, are required to be given in the registration statement, or can lay the basis for any liability, unless their omission makes misleading other facts included in the registration statement pursuant to the requirements of these schedules or otherwise. Even facts required by the schedules are only prima facie material; they will not ultimately be considered material unless they meet the test above stated that they "could reasonably influence the mind of an investor of average prudence."

The amount and nature of detail required to cover each fact of this kind will only be such as are called for to provide a substantially truthful disclosure, not a meticulously accurate one. Considering the multifarious differences between issues of securities, and the different things an investor needs to know about each, no act can do more than enumerate the kinds of facts required. Nor can it prescribe just how much of substantiating data has to be submitted to make the presentation the whole truth and not merely, through omissions, a half truth. In the last analysis, human conduct can be judged only by standards, and not by exact rules. The English have applied this same standard of material fact for over 30 years. Perhaps the best example of the kind of half truth against which the act tries to protect the investor is that for which the English sent Kylsant to jail. The prospectus of the Royal Mail represented that its income over a number of years averaged a certain sum; it did not disclose that the greater part of that income was derived from nonrecurring reserves.

The charge that juries will judge with hindsight, reasoning that to avoid a half truth more data should have been included in the registration statement than a completely honest issuer would have recognized as necessary at the time, sounds well on paper but is not a practical objection. Note that the act itself does all that language can do to avoid the risks of hindsight; it already expressly provides that the reasonable care which will absolve a defendant from liability shall be determined as that which was incumbent at the time of filing the registration statement (sec. 11). As a practical matter, rich men have a habit and a technique of obtaining justice in this country. Moreover, the English, with the same kind of legal system as ours, have since 1900 operated under their companies act without complaint on this score. Indeed the British courts, which have an admitted sense of the practical limitations of juries and other legal machinery, not only have not been afraid of injustice to the rich on this point of omissions, but have deliberately created, without the basis of the clear language to that effect incorporated in the American act, their interpretation imposing liability for omissions which give a false impression. The English act provides the same kind of civil liability for misleading omissions in a prospectus which give a false impression as for positive misstatements; its additional provision for criminal fines is not for misleading omissions in a prospectus or other selling literature, but for selling in violation of the act.

What those who criticize the provisions of the American law about statements of material fact really object to is that the basis of liability is not that of the old common-law liability in fraud. That is to say, affirmative proof of intentional misstatement is not required by the act. But nobody thinks that a liability based upon intentional fraud is any adequate protection to the American investor. We have this practically useless liability at common law already. Lee Higginson's failure to require, or to disclose that they had not required, a proper audit in Kreuger & Toll was not intentional fraud. In such cases, however, the disaster to investors may be no less grave than if intentional fraud had been practiced, and the responsibility is clear. Certainly the Kreuger & Toll issue would not have been floated in the way it was if the Securities Act had been in effect.

Under the American act, therefore, civil liability to the purchaser of a security does not begin to operate unless and until those who offer the security include, in their formal description of it filed with the Federal Trade Commission, a misrepresentation or a half truth serious enough to affect the judgment in the average buyer in his decision to purchase the security. In short, the misstatement or omission must be something pretty bad. Before suit can even begin, the defendants are prima facie not innocent, but guilty. There is nothing, therefore, in the contention that some innocent banker or director may be held cruelly liable because of some wholly unimportant misrepresentation or half truth which he carelessly permitted to creep into a registration statement.

This should be repeated over and over: No one can incur civil liability under the Securities Act unless and until he has participated in, or can fairly be considered prima facie responsible for, a really serious omission or false statement concerning the security in the formal registration statement filed with the Federal Trade Commission at Washington.

V

The persons potentially liable to a purchaser of any given security are, in addition to the issuing company:

(1) Every person who signed the registration statement;

(2) Every person who was a director of (or person performing similar functions), or partner in, the issuer at the time of the filing of the part of the registration statement with respect to which his liability is asserted;

(3) Every person who, with his consent, is named in the registration statement as being or about to become a director, person performing similar functions, or partner;

(4) Every accountant, engineer, or appraiser, or any person whose profession gives authority to a statement made by him, who has with his consent been named as having prepared or certified any part of the registration statement, or as having prepared or certified any report or valuation which is used in connection with the registration statement;

(5) Every underwriter with respect to such security.

If there has been a misrepresentation in the registration statement sufficiently serious to start the machinery of civil liability, the issuing company which got the money from the sale of the security must, if it loses the suit, take back the security from any purchaser at the price the purchaser paid for it, not exceeding the original offering price to the public—no excuses accepted.

For others than the issuers, who did not directly get the money, there may be an excuse. Even if there was some serious misrepresentation upon which potential liability might be based, it may have been an accident, or an excusable faulty emphasis not appreciated at the time the registration statement was filed, or the result of concealed misconduct of an employee, codirector, or other like person. The act provides, therefore, that each of those potentially liable, except the issuer who got the purchase price, may escape liability if he can prove upon being sued that, "as regards any part of the registration statement not purporting to be made on the authority of an expert, and not purporting to be a copy of or extract from a report or valuation of an expert, and not purporting to be made upon the authority of a public official document or statement, he had, after reasonable investigation, reasonable ground to believe, and did believe, that the statements therein were true and that there were no omissions to state a material fact required to be stated therein or necessary to make the statements therein not misleading."

In other words, even if the registration statement told the worst kind of lie, any banker or director would not be held liable to the injured investor if he could show that individually he exercised, under all the circumstances of his personal relation to the issue, reasonable care and competence to see that no lies should be told. That standard of reasonable care is the very backbone of the Anglo-American law of negligence, and for generations English and American courts have successfully applied it to business problems fully as complicated in their facts as any that can arise under the Securities Act.

The provision of the American act that the standard of care and competence required under it shall be that of a fiduciary obeys the strict command of the President's message: "What we seek is a return to a clearer understanding of the ancient truth that those who manage banks, corporations, and other agencies handling or using other people's money are trustees acting for others."

The charge that this standard of a fiduciary is a confused standard differently interpreted under the laws of different States appeals only to the lawyer who wants a definition so sharp that he can calculate to the inch how closely he can slip by. Everywhere the care of a fiduciary is construed to mean substantially the care which a reasonable and prudent man would use in the conduct of his own affairs. All questions of interpretation of the act are Federal questions. The Supreme Court of the United States will therefore have jurisdiction to review and reconcile any out-of-line interpretations of the standard of fiduciary care which the State courts may adopt. Wall Street lawyers, who have long tried to believe in the efficacy of so-called "whitewash clauses" exempting their clients from responsibility for anything, possibly contemplate with fear having to advise clients under such a standard of honesty where whitewash avails not. But the rest of the country, which has for a long time carried on business under the assumption that responsibilities cannot be evaded by words, does not share the apprehension.

The amount of care and competence required of each person potentially liable under the act will, of course, vary with his relation to the issue and to the registration statement. The care expected of ordinary corporation directors would be substantially what they would be called upon to give the business if collectively they were the sole stockholders. The demands upon a managing director or upon the corporation's president and treasurer would be much greater. A small country participant in a syndicate distributing securities will not have to make the original investigation of an issue that is required of the originating underwriter. He will have to make some investigation—at least of the reports made by the originating house—such as any purchaser of the security can fairly expect of a partner participating in a syndicate account no matter how small his share. The ordinary dealer who has no share in the profits of syndicate operations, but receives only the usual dealers' commission given by way of discount or otherwise, is not an underwriter by the express terms of the act. The familiar argument that juries will judge with hindsight has already been considered.

If the defendant cannot bear this burden of proof in respect of his duty of reasonable care and competence, the act provides that he must take the security off the purchaser's hands at the price the purchaser paid for it, but not at a price exceeding that at which it was originally offered to the public. No arguments are permitted as to how much the condition misrepresented in the registration statement actually damaged the value of the security, or how much the purchaser relied on the misrepresentation. If the purchaser has sold the security before suit, the defendant has to do the next best thing—that is, he must pay the purchaser the difference between the price the purchaser paid for the security (not exceeding the original offering price to the public) and the price he sold it for. The original offering price to the public must be given in the registration statement.

Note particularly two things:

(1) The only purchasers who can sue are those who did not know of the misrepresentation and the taint in the security when they bought—a factor which largely eliminates all the bugaboo of strike suits of which the opponents of the act have been complaining. The plaintiff has to show clean hands.

(2) No purchaser, no matter at what price he bought, can recover from the defendant more than—

(a) The original offering price of the security to the public as given in the registration statement—if the purchaser still has the security and can return it; or

(b) The difference between the original offering price and the price at which the purchaser sold the security—if the purchaser has sold it.

The original offering price of the security as given in the registration statement is definitely established as the ceiling of liability by an official administrative interpretation of the act. This ruling completely refutes the lurid argument which has been advanced to the effect that if, after an issue of stock is offered to the public at $10 a share, it is manipulated to $1,000 a share, and A buys at $1,000 and sells to B at $500, B to C at $100, C to D at $10, and D keeps the stock until it reaches zero, the issuing company, the directors, and all others held under the act are liable to A for $500, to B for $400 more, to C for $90 more, to D for $10 more—a total of $1,000, all on a stock originally marketed at $10. Computing astronomical liabilities on this basis, with the thrill of assuming an indefinite number of ups and downs in the market during a stock's tumble to destruction, has been a favorite sport of the act's opponents for weeks.

The administrative interpretation limiting damages to the original offering price of the security is indisputably correct. The act offers damages only as a necessary alternative when rescission is impossible. The registration statement out of which liabilities for misrepresentation grow is filed to permit the original public offering. Clearly, the right of rescission, with its alternative of damages, is based upon the original public offering and the price at which this offering was made. One of the clearest evidences of the fundamental bad faith of Wall Street's propagandists is that when the Federal Trade Commission so interpreted the act, within its clear intent, as already meaning what its critics urged it should be amended to mean, the propagandists charged that the Commission had no power so to interpret and cheat them of an argument to open up the act for other amendments.

VI

Now that we have defined the civil liability under the American act, what are the arguments against it? Overstated for the sake of fairness, they are—

First. The purchaser of a security is allowed to recover even though he cannot affirmatively prove that he actually relied in buying the security upon the misrepresentation in the registration statement. The English act requires this proof.

Second. The recovery which the purchaser is permitted is not restricted to damages which he can affirmatively prove were caused to the value of the security by the conditions misrepresented in the registration statement. In substance, the purchaser may require the seller to take back the goods; that is, as the law says, "to rescind the transaction." The English act gives the purchaser only damages related to the misrepresentation.

Third. Too many persons are held liable to the purchaser in the formal registration statement—particularly accountants and a large variety of intermediate sellers included under the term "underwriter"—and a purchaser can recover from an underwriter from whom he did not actually purchase the security. The English act holds liable only underwriters who actually signed the filed prospectus (which is the English counterpart of the American registration statement). The English act, like the American, does hold liable the company directors.

Objections 1 and 2 can be considered together. The difference between the American and English methods of protecting the investor rests upon a practical recognition of two facts—

First. The American and English methods of distributing securities are different in their approach to the investor.

Second. The average American investor will often never see the registration statement and will, therefore, not be able to prove that he relied upon it in his purchase; nevertheless, the value of his security will inevitably be determined by the reaction to the registration statement of the investment analysts and the professional investing class who will read and rely upon it.

As has been pointed out earlier, the great bulk of securities are purchased in England, not by inexperienced individuals, as in the United States, but by long-established investment trusts, other financial institutions, and wary family solicitors who read and carefully weigh prospectuses. This is in accordance with a business tradition in England which forbids feverish finance and high-pressure salesmanship. England has nothing resembling Wall Street's fearful and wonderful distributing machinery. Furthermore, practically all English buying takes the form of direct subscription, so that the investor always has a direct common-law right of rescission for misrepresentation against the issuer, and sometimes against the banking house. England is a legal unit—process runs throughout the country; and it is a small country, in which service and suit are easy. England knows no problem like ours of the practical inability of the investor in Nebraska to sue an underwriter in New York. The simpler and swifter methods of the English trial of cases both civil and criminal are also a factor in the English investors' protection; false and dilatory defenses by clever lawyers have short shrift in British courts; Lord Kylsant could probably not have been convicted in the United States. Under these circumstances, therefore, there may be little harm in England in confining the right to damages, given the prospectus-studying English investor by his companies act, to those damages which he can show resulted from a fault in the prospectus, such damages being measured by an amount which he can relate to the fault in the prospectus.

In America, however, securities marketed in the grand manner are offered under high pressure to small, unprotected, individual investors, not directly by the issuer or the originating underwriter, but by the last in a chain of many intermediaries, each seller of which, under advice of his lawyer, carefully represents to his buyer merely what his seller represented to him. Consequently the American investor has no effective right of rescission for misrepresentation at common law, and has to be given it by the Securities Act if he is to have it at all. Both the American method of buying securities, and the American investor's relation to the many intermediaries through whom his securities are sold to him, clearly require the express safeguard of rescission in a statute to afford the American investor the same practical protection which the Englishman substantially enjoys from the combination of English law and the English method of distributing securities.

Everyone knows that the average American investor—and it is he whom the Securities Act tries particularly to protect—does not buy his securities but has them sold to him in a hypnotic atmosphere. But, to lean over backward, consider the methods by which that most rare of American investors—the unsolicited buyer who has $1,000 of savings to put into a bond—approaches the problem. Country Dr. Jones, with his $1,000, consults the investment services to which he subscribes, the president of his local bank, or possibly his friend in a brokerage house; he asks, not for details and prospectuses, but for generalized advice which will simply tell him to buy a bond of X Co. He probably does not see or care to see a prospectus, which he could not pretend to evaluate or understand. He almost certainly would never see a registration statement filed with the Federal Trade Commission in Washington. And it is even possible that none of his advisers would see the registration statement, but would, in their turn, rely upon the generalized judgment of their correspondents in some large securities center like New York.

Nevertheless, the price at which Dr. Jones, acting on such advice, would purchase his security from a local dealer, and the value it would have in his hands thereafter, would inevitably be fixed by the reactions to the issue on the part of large institutions and individual professional buyers who either purchased or refused to purchase after making their own investigations of the registration statement or after having it investigated by investment analysts in their employ. As a practical matter—and every securities man knows this—the judgment of big buyers, not that of the scattered, uninformed mass of small buyers, determines the price of any security at any time. The value of the security in Dr. Jones' hands depends, therefore, upon the reliance of other people upon the registration statement, together with any misrepresentation or misleading omission it may include. But Dr. Jones could never prove in court that he himself had relied upon the registration statement.

If, therefore, Dr. Jones is to have effective protection against the actual loss which his pocketbook may suffer because of misrepresentations or omissions in the registration statement describing X Co.'s bonds, he must not be required to prove an impossible case—namely, that he relied upon the registration statement which, even if it reached him, he did not read, and which, frankly, he was not expected to read. As a corollary, he should not be put to the proof, again practically impossible under American conditions, of showing a relationship between a particular misrepresentation and a particular amount of damage to the security. A damaged security should be actually worth just as much to a banker or a director who has to take it back as to a mulcted investor. The only fair and practical protection to the investor is to entitle him to give back the security to any one of its sponsors, thus putting upon them, experienced in the securities business, or at least in this security, the burden of salvaging for their own account the difference between its offering price and its damaged value.

The opponents of the Securities Act argue against the necessity of this last step—a general right of rescission—by citing an artfully simplified case. Suppose, they say, a company concealed in its registration statement a contingent tax obligation which would decrease by the amount of $5 a share both the book and the market value of stock offered at $25 a share. Why not let the purchaser keep the security and collect damages of $5 a share instead of having the whole issue dumped back upon the sellers? The answer is that a case so mathematically simple would not occur once in 5,000 times. As a matter of fact, even if it did occur, the careful analyst—he who ultimately determines the market value of securities after studying their registration statements—might mark down the stock much more than $5 a share upon discovering the omission, because of its effect on working capital position, or its revelation that management was careless or untrustworthy, or for many other reasons.

Let us suppose a much more usual case. An artificial-gas company falsely represents in the registration statement for its stock that it has no potential natural-gas competition. When the misrepresentation is discovered, the stock falls in value. There is no way on earth to measure the effect of impending competition upon the book value of the stock, or to estimate how much of its decline in market value might have been caused by the disclosure of such competition. Even if the company's stock is listed on a large stock exchange, it may, in falling, fluctuate widely; if it is an unlisted stock, particularly of a small, local company, its market may be hopelessly erratic. Every lawyer knows that in trying to prove damages in court there is no practical problem more difficult than that of establishing the market value of unlisted securities. It becomes even more difficult when the problem is to establish, not market value, but the purely hypothetical degree to which a drop in value may have been caused by a particular misrepresentation in a registration statement. In such a suit for damages, with the burden of proof on the investor, Wall Street lawyers would win every time.

Why should the individual investor, who has little enough to spend on lawyers' fees, have to undertake this difficult burden against a seller or other person who, by reason of an admitted misstatement of a material fact, is prima facie guilty rather than innocent before liability becomes even potential? Why not let the investor simply dump the sour security back upon its sponsor at the original offering price, and let the sponsor undertake to salvage what value there is left in it?

When critics of the Securities Act are pushed to the wall by this argument for practical justice to the investor, they cry that any financial house risks ruin if it puts out a big issue with the chance that it may have to take it all back. The answer to this is that a business which undertakes big volume in order to make big profits must expect big losses when big profits go wrong.

If Jones sells Brown a truck horse by representing it as a race horse and in an action for rescission, permitted Brown under the common law, has to take back the truck horse for which he has no other purchaser, Jones may be as much ruined as a great banking house which has to take back a whole issue of securities from a multitude of small investors. But, even so, the Securities Act gives the banker an edge over Jones. The banker has a last clear chance to avoid liability if he can prove that, although he misrepresented his securities, he did so in good faith after taking reasonable care and exercising reasonable competence to describe them correctly. The Street's objection to this remedy of rescission which is granted by the Securities Act comes down, ultimately, to a bold assertion of special privilege, that the big business of selling securities should not be legally so risky per sales unit as the little business of selling anything else!

To summarize. The American act does go further than the English act in imposing civil liability by permitting the American investor either—

(1) To recover from those liable, even though the investor cannot prove that in buying the security in suit he relied upon a specific misrepresentation in the registration statement; or

(2) To turn back a security for its full original public-offering price without having to prove the amount of damage arising out of any specific misrepresentation.

But these differences are judicious adaptations to conditions peculiar to America, and they are absolutely necessary to give the American investor a fair deal. The English statute, if applied verbatim to American conditions, would on these points give the American investor no protection at all.

VII

"But", says Wall Street, "this heavy liability of rescission may be tolerable against the issuing company, which presumably receives the proceeds of the issue, and against the many varieties of underwriters who make large profits on the issue, but it is prohibitively onerous on the directors of the issuing company who presumably profit only indirectly from the entire transaction. The English law holds the directors of an issuing company liable to the investor, but that liability, like all other liability under the English act, is only for provable damages, not for rescission."

In evaluating this argument one should remember that—

(1) To confine the rights of an American investor to a suit in which he must prove, first, that he relied upon misrepresentation in a registration statement, and, second, that certain specific damage resulted, would give the investor no practical protection at all. Any liability of a director to an American investor must, to be effective, be in the nature of rescission.

(2) No director is liable to an investor under the Securities Act unless there first appears in a formal registration statement filed by him and his fellow directors with the Federal Trade Commission, the purpose of which is to induce the public to invest funds in his enterprise, a serious misstatement or misleading omission.

(3) No director is liable to an investor, even then, despite the existence of a serious misrepresentation or omission, if he can show that, individually, he used reasonable care and competence at the time of filing the registration statement to guard against such errors.

(4) The Securities Act gives each director, along with all others liable, a right of contribution against the issuing company, his fellow directors, the underwriters, and all others liable, to spread his loss on any recovery against him by an investor. In other words, the act puts no obstacle in the way of prearrangement among all those potentially liable for the sharing of liabilities.

(5) The registration statement, with the material misrepresentation or misleading omission out of which liability may grow, is the statement of these individual directors themselves, filed with their approval and by their order. They, as individuals, are the real issuer; theirs is the decision to issue the securities; a majority of them have to sign the registration statement; any one of them who does not sign it and wants to disclaim it has at least 20 days after the filing to disclaim and resign. Even the underwriters rely for information upon the directors or upon the management which the directors have selected. This liability of the directors, then, is a fair and necessary insurance to the bankers who are also liable, as well as to the investors, all of whom put up money relying upon the care and competence of the directors.

The argument is advanced that protection of the investor does not require this liability of directors; let the investor proceed against the issuing company, or against the underwriters, who, presumably, can better afford to take the load. More often than not, however, purchasers suing an issuing corporation for rescission may find that the proceeds of their purchases are no longer with the company but have been frozen, dissipated, or otherwise lost in the business, and hence cannot be paid back. As for underwriters, it is probably true that most small issues are floated directly by the issuer to the purchaser, without the interposition of intermediary underwriters who could be looked to as responsible defendants if suit against the issuer was not fruitful; and intermediary underwriters may be able to prove that, in acting upon statements of the directors, they exercised due care and competence, and are not themselves liable to the purchaser. As a matter of practical justice it is not possible, therefore, to duck the issue of directors' liability by saying that there are plenty of other people better able to pay the investor.

The real question here is whether individuals, while acting as directors of corporations, are to be responsible to those whom they injure. Woodrow Wilson[1] put the problem in classic phrase nearly 20 years ago when the new deal was the new freedom:

"The present task of the law is nothing less than to rehabilitate the individual, * * * to undo enough of what we have done in the development of our law of corporations to give the law direct access again to the individual—to every individual in all his functions.

"Corporations do not do wrong. Individuals do wrong, the individuals who direct and use them for selfish and illegitimate purposes, to the injury of society and the serious curtailment of private rights. Guilt, as has been very truly said, is always personal. You cannot punish corporations. Fines fall upon the wrong persons; more heavily upon the innocent than upon the guilty; as much upon those who knew nothing whatever of the transactions for which the fine is imposed as upon those who originated and carried them through—upon the stockholders and the customers rather than upon the men who direct the policy of the business. * * * Law can never accomplish its objects in that way. It can never bring peace or command respect by such futilities. * * *

"Society cannot afford to have individuals wield the power of thousands without personal responsibility. It cannot afford to let its strongest men be the only men who are inaccessible to the law. Modern democratic society, in particular, cannot afford to constitute its economic undertakings upon the monarchial or aristocratic principle and adopt the fiction that the kings and great men thus set up can do no wrong which will make them personally amenable to the law which restrains smaller men; that their kingdoms, not themselves, must suffer for their blindness, their follies, and their transgressions of right."

The critics of the Securities Act finally advance a practical argument. No one, they say, will be willing to act as a director of a corporation which needs funds if he has to assume the risks of being careful and competent, or having to share with other careless or incompetent sponsors of the corporation's appeal to the public the burden of making investors whole. American business will be directed completely by dummies. It is noteworthy that the Street's propagandists, when pushed to the wall, ultimately rely on this kind of practical argument, which amounts to saying that—

1. No matter how just or socially expedient the act may be, bankers and corporation directors just will not take its risks.

2. American financing cannot be done except upon their terms.

It should be frankly recognized that this raises the simple issue of whether it is possible for Congress to regulate the securities business at all. Can the law be made to serve the interests of a democratic community, or must it be written to conform to the wishes of the financially powerful? In short, must the law bow to a capital strike?

As a matter of fact, the threat of dummy directors is a bugaboo. The act took good care, in section 15, that this should not happen by providing that the real parties in interest could not avoid liabilities through dummies under their control. Nor will undesirable resignations occur on any important scale. The unreasoning fear reported to be current among directors has been deliberately drummed up by Wall Street's loose talk of fantastic liabilities. But it will cool down. The average business-man director will learn that under the act, as under all law, he can rely for his protection upon his own common-sense judgment; that the act's standard of due care and competence, before juries of common-sense men like himself, will require him to pay only that decent attention to the corporation's business which stockholders and other investors expect of those who are supposed to be running it in return for benefits received.

In a practical world no one thinks or expects that directors serve corporations solely for the nominal fees they get. A director serves to protect his large stockholding interests, or for an occasional salary, or connections, or influence, or for other business reasons. All this will not be abandoned overnight. Directors who have a real interest in a corporation through stockholding or otherwise, and a sufficient knowledge of its operations not to be afraid to try to tell the truth about it, will not desert either the corporation or their emoluments. Big stockholders will either hang on to their directorships or get competent representatives to attend to their interests, paying them in proportion to risk and service. The act will undoubtedly cause considerable shifting in the interlocking and highly dressed picture hitherto presented by the Directory of Directors. The lawyers who should be merely professional advisers, the big names who decorate corporation reports, the "kept" directors who represent short of inquisitive interests, will resign. Only they will mind!

The same reasons which require that directors assume responsibility for their statements require that accountants, engineers, and other experts be liable for want of due care and competence in representations in the registration statement which can be specifically attributed to them. The banker and the investor risk their money in enterprises, and the director acts because of the expert service which these specialists sell and for which they are well paid. It is particularly important, therefore, that every factor be utilized to compel these experts in enlightened self-interest to take the greatest care. It is also important that public opinion should not permit accountants to charge outrageous additional fees to recertify, for a registration statement to be filed under the act, their own audits of former years for which they have been adequately paid, and on which the company, the bankers, and earlier investors have already relied.

VIII

The Street puts this case: Suppose a securities distributor in St. Louis takes what is called a "selling-group participation" of $50,000 in a $50,000,000 issue originated by a great New York house. Theoretically the Securities Act makes it possible for all investors—even those who have bought the securities from other distributors in Boston, Seattle, and New Orleans—to come out to St. Louis and put the St. Louis house upon proof of its due care and competence if it is to avoid having to pay the "outside" investors for their losses. That, say the critics, is inequitable to the St. Louis house.

At this point it is necessary to explain certain phenomena peculiar to the American method of distributing securities. Before the war most American issues sold through an underwriter were bought from the issuing company by a single originating underwriter, and sold by that underwriter's salesmen directly to dealers at a standardized commission given by way of discount. The dealers, in turn, sold to retail customers. It was a slow, careful business; a good originating house brought out comparatively few issues a year and had time to make sure of their quality.

After the war a certain well-known house in the Street invented the high-pressure device of the so-called "selling group." The house which found the business entered into a kind of partnership arrangement with a selling group of possibly scores of dealers all over the United States. By this arrangement each member dealer became in effect a partner in stated proportions with the originating house and with other members in sharing both the risks of selling the issue and the profits of an open-market pool manipulation in the security, which, for additional compensation, the originating house would operate as manager of the group for a stated period of 60 days or more.

From the retail dealer's point of view, pool profits were far more lucrative in good times than fixed dealers' commissions. From the point of view of the originating house, selling-group partnerships with such outside dealers as were willing to take the gamble greatly increased the speed with which it could unload from itself the greater part of the risks of selling an issue. This very speed made it necessary to originate more and more hastily prepared securities in order to keep the complicated selling-group machines supplied with something to sell; and the absorption of investment funds by these high-pressure sales machines forced conservative houses, which would have preferred to do business on the slower basis of quality, to adopt similar tactics in self-preservation. Finally these competitive tactics brought half of the investment world to smash.

The Securities Act draws a careful line between those retailers who sell on a fixed commission and the selling-group participants who want to go into pool partnerships with the originating underwriter. The term "underwriter", by the express wording of the act, "shall not include a person whose interest is limited to a commission from an underwriter or dealer not in excess of the usual and customary distributors' or sellers' commission." Such a retailer, like his salesmen, is liable only to an immediate purchaser to whom he sells under false representation or without revealing what he then knows is a defect in the registration statement.

But all selling-group partners, sharing profits with the originating underwriter are themselves underwriters within the act, and each is theoretically liable, like partners in any other business, to suits by every purchaser who may buy securities marketed by the partnership on the basis of a false registration statement—unless, of course, any particular participant can show his own care and competence in the matter. The investor, whose protection is the first interest of the act, may recover against whichever of such participants is most accessible to suit; he does not have to chase an elusive defendant all over the country. Of course, as a practical matter, an investor who finds, on suing, that his local member of the selling group is judgment-proof, will naturally move, not against the minor members of the selling group in other localities, but against the responsible originating house in New York or Chicago. But the St. Louis house can protect itself against even theoretical risks on any particular issue by conducting its business in one of two ways—

1. It can be satisfied with a straight dealer's discount on its sales, without taking a flyer in pool profits with the originating house.

2. It can insist that it will not participate in a selling group, when it does not feel sufficiently sure of the registration statement and the quality of the issue, unless the selling-group agreement includes an arrangement by which the originating house and others of the inner circle satisfactorily indemnify the St. Louis house and other smaller participants against liability for misrepresentations in the registration statement.

The act, although it forbids any arrangement whereby an investor waives his rights under it, in no way interferes with any arrangement for indemnity between sellers. The eternal ingenuity of the Street, which has never experienced difficulty in finding a way to divide profits, can safely be relied upon to work out the equally practical problem of dividing losses. Small dealers may feel, perhaps, that big houses will not give them issues to sell on straight commission or with provision for indemnity; but if they stick together, the big houses will have to come around. The principle of noninterference with honest business does not require that adequate protection of investors be sacrificed in order to preserve a technique of high-pressure syndicate salesmanship which, entirely apart from any Securities Act, has already wrecked many investment houses and wellnigh ruined the investment business.

Any scheme which confined the liability of a selling-group member to those to whom he sold directly or derivatively would raise, for an investor holding a bearer share of stock or bond, the impossible problems involved in proving his chain of title. The act has to try to protect more than the first purchaser of a security. That first purchaser may be only a speculator for the rise or a straw intermediary intended to insulate liability. The ultimate investor whom the act wants to protect may buy at the end of a whole chain of other buyers and sellers; that is, on a stock exchange through which the security is really being distributed, from an anonymous seller who passes on a piece of paper already passed through many hands, endorsed in blank or in a Street name. How could such an investor prove from what original distributor he derives title? If the act provided that responsibility should not exceed participations in the selling group, it would be perfectly possible to divide the paper participations in such a way as to throw responsibility under the act most heavily upon irresponsible houses, while a secret division of the real profits could be effected without the knowledge of the law. The proposal that only those underwriters who signed the registration statement should be liable would make it possible for any number of strong houses really to sponsor an issue through selling groups' support with the names of unimportant houses signed to the registration statement. These points are suggested simply to indicate some of the practical problems touching the protection of the investor which have to be faced the moment an attempt is made to adjust the theoretical equity between underwriters.

IX

It is possible now, after all that has been said, to state the fundamental scheme and philosophy of the Securities Act. It proceeds on the realistic assumption that the ignorant and overreached investor is going to continue to be with us; that he has not learned his lesson and probably will not be permitted to do so. Utopian theories of teaching the small investor overnight that he should not sink his money in securities until after he has made the kind of investigation which he is not qualified to make—and which, in any event, he lacks the power to make—are not a practical answer. "It is a condition which confronts us—not a theory."

The act is practical. It looks upon an investment transaction in this way: On one side is a small investor who pays his money. On the other is a self-constituted, interrelated group who receive the money—the issuing corporation, its directors, its bankers, and the experts they employ on the issue. By agreement among themselves, that group divides the money and its direct or indirect benefits. The portions and the interrelations constantly vary. The receiving group alone knows the inside story. The investor knows nothing and usually can learn nothing. If when securities turn out damaged in his hands he is forced to prove reliance upon the registration statement and to prove specific damage as well, if he is compelled to thread the maze of interrelations to find the particular person in the receiving group who is to blame and from whom he traces his title, his task is practically hopeless.

The act, therefore, makes all members of this receiving group who cannot prove their individual competence and care, with relation to the security, jointly and severally liable to any investor to take back a damaged security at not more than its original offering price. All are held because the omission of any will create loopholes and arguments that practically may release all. The act then does practical justice to the defendant who is sued by giving him an express right of contribution over against any and all of his fellow members of the receiving group who are likewise liable. It assumes that the smarter receiving group, who long ago learned how to agree among themselves when it came to dividing up the profits of an issue, can, by voluntary agreement, either at the time of offering the security to the public or later, achieve the task which no law can attempt—that is, of arranging among themselves an equitable risk of the losses incident to their intricate transactions.

The defendants and the critics of the act find it impossible to reach agreement because of a fundamental difference in their points of view. The act looks at the investment transaction from the point of view of the investor first; it lays down those provisions which are necessary, as a practical matter, to protect him and puts the burden upon the group who get his money to take care of their own interrelations within the bounds of those necessities. The critics see primarily how inconvenient such protection of the investor is going to be to themselves and how upsetting to the well-worn ways of their selling business. Quite honestly, they cannot conceive why it is not more desirable to sacrifice the protection of the investor than to change their methods of doing business.

But no American administration needs apologize to the Street for attempting to regulate a business as socially expensive as our securities business has proved to be. Nor need it be squeamishly embarrassed if, in its regulation of such a business, it has perhaps not confined itself to the absolutely necessary minimum. The forthcoming test on the inviolability of the Securities Act offers a real opportunity to draw a line on issues much more fundamental than any that may be involved in squabbles over statutory language. We have come to the point where we shall have to take sides! And those who have more than a few years to live, or have given hostages to fortune in children to live after them—those who do not relish a recovery which shall simply be a seat on a new powder barrel with the fuze already sputtering—ought to know on which side they stand.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

As in legislative session,

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Committee on Banking and Currency believes it will be able to submit a report tomorrow on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill which was introduced the other day, and probably not until tomorrow. I want to ask unanimous consent, because the Senate will be in recess tomorrow, I understand, to be permitted to file the report with the Secretary of the Senate tomorrow, so it can be printed and the bill can go on the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. I did not understand the Senator's request.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill extending time for the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The committee has practically concluded its consideration of the bill, but the matter has gone over until tomorrow morning for further discussion. I am quite sure we will be able to report the bill tomorrow. Because the Senate is not to be in session, I desire to have permission to file the report so it can be printed and the bill can go to the calendar.

Mr. McNARY. That automatically would occur if filed today or if filed Monday. Of course, it would have to go over for a day in that event. Is there anything urgent about it?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; because their time expires very shortly. I would like to get the report filed tomorrow and the bill printed.

Mr. McNARY. Is this just a matter of the prolongation of the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or does it involve the matter of the appropriation of some $2,000,000,000?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it does not involve the appropriation. That is contained in another bill.

Mr. McNARY. Very well, I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Florida is granted.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, in executive session, and as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate: The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hope in a brief time to submit facts with regard to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Treaty which, even if not strongly presented, will be of information to the Senate in a further study and discussion of the subject.

This is no new subject. As far back as 1920 President Wilson requested the International Joint Commission to investigate and report on the subject. In 1922 the Commission made their report. The Joint Commission took testimony along the St. Lawrence River and the Great Lakes on both sides of the boundary. They took testimony in all of the large cities touching every phase of the question. The Commission made a report, and the substance of the report was that the opening up of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River for ocean navigation would be of tremendous benefit to shippers.

That was not all. We find that since the time of President Wilson other Presidents have made the same recommendation. I first take President Harding, who had this to say:

> In our country is presented one of the world's most attractive opportunities for extension of the seaways many hundred miles inland.
> The heart of the continent, with its vast resources in both agriculture and industry, would be brought in a communication with all the ocean routes by the execution of the St. Lawrence waterway project. To enable ocean-going vessels to have access to all the ports of the Great Lakes would have a most stimulating effect upon the industrial life of the continent's interior.
> The feasibility of the project is unquestioned, and its cost, compared with some other great engineering works, would be small. Disorganized and prostrate, the nations of central Europe are even now setting their hands to the development of a great continental waterway which, connecting the Rhine and Danube, will bring water transportation from the Black to the North Sea, from the Mediterranean to the Baltic.
> If nationalistic prejudices and economic difficulties can be overcome by Europe, they certainly should not be formidable obstacles to an achievement less expensive, and giving promise of greater advantages to the peoples of North America.

I now quote from Calvin Coolidge:

> The time has come to resume in a moderate way the opening of our intracoastal waterways; the control of flood waters of the Mississippi and Colorado Rivers; the improvement of the waterways from the Great Lakes toward the Gulf of Mexico; and the development of the great power and navigation project of the St. Lawrence River, for which efforts are now being made to secure the necessary treaty with Canada.
> These projects cannot all be undertaken at once, but all should have the immediate consideration of Congress and be adopted as fast as plans can be matured and the necessary funds become available.
> This is not incompatible with economy, for their nature does not require so much a public expenditure as a capital investment which will be reproductive, as evinced by the marked increase in revenue from the Panama Canal. Upon these projects depends much future industrial and agricultural progress. They represent the protection of large areas from flood, and the addition of a great amount of cheap power and cheap freight by use of navigation, chief of which is the bringing of ocean-going ships to the Great Lakes.

There was a conservative President, a man known for his conservatism. It was not a new question to President Coolidge. It had been under investigation for many years.

Now let us come to the statement of President Hoover. President Hoover was undoubtedly an engineer, undoubtedly capable of understanding such questions. He said:

> The signing of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty marks another step forward in this the greatest internal improvement yet undertaken on the North American Continent. * * * Its completion will have a profoundly favorable effect upon the development of agriculture and industry throughout the Midwest. The large by-product of power will benefit the Northeast * * *.
> The waterway will probably require 10 years for completion, during which time normal growth of traffic in the Nation will far more than compensate for any diversions from American railways and other American port facilities. The economic gains from improved transportation have always benefited the whole people * * *.
> The project is of first importance to the whole continent. The many and extremely complex engineering, legal, commercial, and international problems have been worked out by the representatives of both countries in a spirit of cooperation of which all North America can be justly proud.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the able Senator from Nevada if there is any other explanation of such Presidential unanimity than the importance and value of the proposed treaty to our Nation?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think there could be any other answer.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall be glad to yield as soon as I have completed my answer to the Senator from Colorado.

It will be recalled that there were Republican Presidents who recommended this proposal. There was first a Democratic President, Woodrow Wilson, who undoubtedly was very progressive in his tendencies, certainly far ahead of anyone in the past. There is no question that he recognized this as one of the greatest developments in the country and so expressed himself and started the wheels moving.

Then we had President Harding, a man of magnificent expression, a man whose heart undoubtedly was constantly in tune with the common people of the country.

Following him we had a type of President who was entirely different in that respect, President Coolidge. He had the reputation of being exceedingly conservative. He was a man who looked at the matter from the business standpoint. He was not moved by sentiment. Yet this President of such an entirely different type absolutely concurred in everything that had moved the Democratic President in 1913.

Then, moving still onward, we find President Hoover, differing in characteristics from President Coolidge, undoubtedly a conservative of conservatives, undoubtedly a man whose mind went to business rather than to sentiment, whose vision was governed by his judgment with regard to engineering and economics.

After that we find our President of today, President Roosevelt, not jumping to a certain conclusion, because the question had been before him when he was Governor of the State of New York for a period of years. He has had every opportunity to study every phase of the question, and, as a matter of fact, has studied it. He is not a man who is opposed to the railroads. He recognizes that they are essential to the transportation of the country and he has done everything he could to sustain them during the calamity. He has approved loans of $400,000,000 to them for the purpose of keeping them from going into bankruptcy and permitting them to continue to operate. We cannot say that he is prejudiced. He has favored the largest development program ever submitted to this country or any other country in the world, and with this intimate knowledge, having studied it for years while Governor of New York, he presents to this body a definite conclusive message calling attention to the value of this great project and its importance and urges Congress to act. There can be no action except through Congress.

The essential development of the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River must be participated by Canada and the United States, because sovereignty over those waters and over the land lying under the waters resides in both Governments. There can be no extensive development there except by consent of both Governments. That has been attempted to be accomplished through a treaty between the two sides, and a treaty has been negotiated.

This is no insignificant matter.

Now I will yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the course of the Senator's argument, except to point out that there are millions of people in the United States who have been in favor of the general principle of development of the St. Lawrence seaway who are bitterly opposed to the pending treaty by reason of certain provisions contained in it. I am sure the Senator did not mean to suggest that either President Wilson or President Harding or President Coolidge had committed himself in any way to the principle of internationalization of Lake Michigan or the principle of the United States expending millions and possibly hundreds of millions of dollars in Canada under provisions which require the employment of Canadian labor, material, and engineers, which are provisions contained in the pending treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. I consider the present President of the United States as great as any of the prior Presidents of the United States. I know that he understands the subject almost as well as the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I was not casting any reflections on the present President of the United States; but the Senator summoned several witnesses here, and quoted at some length from them, who never committed themselves to any such provisions as are contained in the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. We will admit that President Wilson and President Harding knew nothing about the negotiation of this treaty. That is not true as to President Coolidge, in my opinion, because the terms of this treaty were under discussion quite a while ago. The exact terms of it, I admit, were not down in writing at that time. That President Hoover understood the terms of this treaty is, I think, evident. That the present President of the United States understands them I think is likewise evident. The other witness did not.

This is no small matter, to be treated cavalierly. It is no matter as to which one can say, "Well, I do not like this article of the treaty or that article of the treaty." It is not sufficient to say that it surrenders sovereignty to another government unless the argument is sustained by good reason and by the evidence. It is insufficient to say that we are furnishing money to build projects in another country without defining the matter more carefully than that. I say to you that this is one of the greatest projects ever undertaken in the United States, equal, if not superior, to the Panama Canal, and all the authorities agree on it. It is not a little matter that affects a few farmers who raise wheat. Here is what it affects:

Let me take, first, the population of the seaway—and by "the seaway" is meant that area that would be tributary to this form of transportation. I may say that, in my opinion, if it were a very small area and an insignificant water-transportation project, the railroads would not be opposing it; but they know the magnitude of it.

Now, let us see what the seaway is.

The population of the seaway area, exclusive of States only partially included, was 42,470,045 in 1930. This represents approximately 35 percent of the population of the country. It compares with a population of 50,220,680 in the Atlantic area, 19,872,772 in the Gulf area, and 10,211,549 in the Pacific area.

For the past 30 years the population of the area has increased almost uniformly at the rate of 13 percent per decade.

If the parts of States not wholly embraced in the seaway area are included, the population to be directly benefited by lower transportation costs totals approximately 45,000,000. This area includes 35 cities of more than 100,000 population.

The value of manufactured products in the area in 1929, exclusive of those States only partially included, totaled $27,040,672,000, or approximately 38 percent of the national total.

If all the counties of other States included in the seaway area, as delimited on the map prepared by the United States Engineers, are included in the seaway area, the combined value of manufactured products in this area totaled $32,600,499,000 in 1929, or 46 percent of the total for the United States as a whole. This manufacture involved the purchase of raw materials of a total value of $18,277,951,000, or 47 percent of the total value of all raw materials purchased by factories throughout the country.

Of the 17 States which lead the country in factory production, 9 are wholly and 2 are partially within the seaway area.

That is as to industries. Now let us see how this project affects agriculture.

The agricultural production of the country is also largely centered in the seaway area. The States wholly within the area contain 52 percent of all the crop land, 51 percent of the total value of farm property, 50 percent of the total value of livestock, 52 percent of the dairy cows, 72 percent of the swine, 66 percent of the butter output, and 49 percent of the egg production.

In grain crops this region produces 76 percent of the corn, 64 percent of the wheat, and 84 percent of the oats raised in the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. If it is not inconvenient, will the Senator mention the States that are wholly within the seaway area and those that are materially affected by it but outside or only partly within it?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; I will in a few minutes.

Mr. President, let me read a little bit from our report touching that subject.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator leaves the general question of agriculture, I should like to submit one general observation.

Regardless of contemporary mathematics or any attempt to argue the details of the specific situation, I desire to recall the Senator's memory and the Senate's attention to the fact that one of the most intelligent friends of agriculture who ever sat in the Senate was the late Senator from Montana, Mr. Thomas J. Walsh. Senator Walsh time and time and time again declared, not only to us but to the country, that in his observation and in his analysis there is nothing remotely comparable with the development of this seaway for the general permanent advantage of midcontinent and western agriculture. I know that every man within the sound of my voice at this moment at least has the utmost respect for the opinions of this great Senator who sat here from the State of Montana, and captured not only our affection but our complete respect for his opinion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator.

I have the States referred to here in the record. I have them on these maps, but I would rather not take the time to take up the maps. Later on I will refer to them. Here is the area included in the report of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army. It includes the following States in their entirety: Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas. It also includes a part of New York, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, Colorado, Wyoming, and Montana.

I have laid down here very briefly the magnitude of this undertaking. I have shown what it affects. I have called witnesses in endorsement of it. Now let me give just a few bold figures here, and then go back to the matter later on.

The joint board of engineers, composed of the ablest engineers in this country—mostly Army engineers—with the ablest engineers they have in Canada, have carefully estimated these costs. They may be in error. No one can tell as to that. I will say that the Bureau of Reclamation estimated the cost of the Boulder Dam project, which involved a sum probably half this amount, involved just as original an undertaking as this, and involved the building of a dam higher than was ever built in the world before; and this body was so uneasy with regard to the report of the engineers of the Bureau of Reclamation that on a resolution that I offered it created a special board consisting of the great engineers of this country to go down and check up on the Reclamation Service. Why? Because local engineers had records presented here by Senators stating that it would cost twice as much as the Reclamation Service had estimated. The Board of Engineers checked on the estimate and found it substantially accurate. Not only that, but that dam has been under construction now for a period of 3 years; and the actual cost as they moved along—and the most difficult part of it is over—proves that the estimate was conservatively within the actual costs.

The joint board put the total cost of this project at $543,429,000; the United States' part of it at $272,453,000. The State of New York, under the treaty, would have the right to participate in the power, and it would pay of the cost of the United States the sum of $89,726,750, leaving the net cost to the United States at $182,726,250.

Let us see what would happen. It is estimated by this same joint board, whose figures have not been questioned, that it will take $9,300,000 annually to amortize this investment in 50 years. They find that that amounts to 7.4 cents per capita on the people of this country and only 23.2 cents per capita per annum in the seaway. That is not such an extraordinary expenditure on behalf of our Government. We have spent over $200,000,000 on the harbors of the United States. I think we have spent about fifty-odd million dollars on the harbor of New York. I know we have spent very large sums, probably $13,000,000, on the Boston Harbor; probably $18,000,000 on the Baltimore Harbor; enormous sums on the harbor at New Orleans—not only on the harbor at New Orleans but on the jetties leading out into the Gulf of Mexico. I say to the Senate that the people of this country have taxed themselves to the extent of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars in aid of water navigation.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I believe the Senator stated a moment ago that engineers who opposed the building of this canal had estimated that it would cost a considerable amount in excess of the estimates which had previously been submitted.

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I referred to the Boulder Dam project, not to the St. Lawrence project.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I believe this proposed canal calls for an expenditure of some $534,000,000?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not reasonable to believe that this project will cost at least 35 percent more than the estimated cost. I make that inquiry because I am reliably informed that the Suez Canal cost a considerable amount more than had been estimated, and that in the construction of the Panama Canal in reality it cost about 35 percent more than had been estimated at the outset. I am making these inquiries just for my own information in the premises.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have no doubt that the Senator is correctly stating the facts, although I do not remember the figures myself. What he states is very probably accurate. I realize that in the building of the Panama Canal the cost did go over the estimates, largely by reason of the slides in the Culebra Cut, which made it necessary to do the work a second time. I do not remember the history of the Suez Canal, but I say it will be found that in modern times, at least in the last 10 or 15 years, the estimates of the Government engineers have been remarkably accurate. I only give the illustration of the Boulder Dam project because I happen to be familiar with that. It was estimated, I think, that the whole project would cost about one hundred and fifty or one hundred and sixty million dollars. One of the Senators brought in a statement made by a distinguished American engineer that in his opinion it would cost two or three times that amount, and we did have a disinterested board of engineers check the matter up to see what they thought about it, and they checked the figures, and after the work had actually gone on for 3 years it has been proved that the estimates were correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us what, in his judgment, the effect of the construction of this canal would be upon the deep waterway connecting Chicago with the Gulf of Mexico, which has been under construction for a number of years?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will get to that.

Mr. VANDERBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Before the Senator diverts from the question of cost, may I offer one observation in response to the Senator from North Carolina? The Senator from Nevada was not on the subcommittee, and did not hear the engineers testify, and that is the only reason why I am intruding the information.

General Markham, who is now the head of the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, was one of the experts who figured the cost accounts. He was interrogated at great length in respect to the validity of his figures and the assurances that we could count upon their not being exceeded in the ultimate experiment. Far from facing the expectation that the figures are insufficient, the testimony before the committee on the part of the Government's experts was that the figures were made on the 1926 price level, and that except as that price level is regained, the cost of construction actually should be less rather than more in respect to the estimates which have been made.

I particularly remember that General Markham repeatedly gave the committee the assurance of his complete conviction that the project could be completed well within the figures which have been submitted in the report. Indeed, we raised the question whether the item of interest on capital investment during maintenance should not have been included, as it was not—and it was not included, I may say, because it never is included in Board of Rivers and Harbors Engineers' estimates. I thought that should have been included, and I asked the general about it in the testimony. His response was that he felt so sure of the margin of safety in the figures he has submitted that he presumed to say that the margin of safety would even include the cost of capital maintenance during construction.

Mr. CLARK and Mr. LA FOLLETTE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I should just like to ask the Senator from Michigan whether he has seen the estimate made by Col. Hugh L. Cooper, an engineer with a world-wide reputation, who probably has been connected, during the course of his engineering experience, with more great engineering enterprises than any engineer now living in the United States, who estimates that this project will cost $1,250,000,000?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to respond to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I have seen the Cooper estimates, and I have seen other estimates. My judgment is that those estimates were made as the result of an abstract study by these engineers, without any intimate investigation upon the ground. My opinion is that there are no more expert engineers in this world than those who are operating under the Board of Rivers and Harbors today. They know every inch of the proposed waterway section. They have covered the St. Lawrence project from one end to the other time and time again. I venture the assertion that Colonel Cooper has never been over it at all with respect to detailed engineering estimates. Under such circumstances I submit to the Senator from Nevada and to the Senate that the estimates of the engineers employed by the Government and speaking for the Government take priority over the casual estimate of Colonel Cooper or of anybody else.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will yield, I simply wanted to cite a further point in connection with the statement of the Senator from Michigan concerning costs, because it so happens that we have had a little concrete experience so far as concerns the actual working out of estimates made on the 1926 price level and construction going forward at this time.

It happens that work has already been authorized to deepen the Sault Ste. Marie Channel, and estimates in regard thereto were made on the 1926 price level, as are the estimates for the additional work on the seaway. I call attention to General Markham's testimony in connection with the experience in actual operation under those estimates, which appears on page 350 of the hearings before the committee. I asked the colonel:

> Are your independent estimates based on 1926 unit prices?
> Colonel MARKHAM. These estimates are now based upon 1926 unit prices less 20 percent in the channels. We are doing the work for about 50 cents on the dollar as it stands.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I called atttention a while ago to what happened with respect to the estimates in the matter of the Boulder Dam project only because very distinguished engineers, like Mr. Cooper, without personal investigation or survey, gave it as their opinion that that project would cost two or three times the amount of the estimate, and therefore it became essential to convince this body that the Government estimate was substantially correct, because in the matter of the Boulder Dam project we had to earn enough from power to pay for the project. The result was, as I have said, that this distinguished board of independent engineers reported sustaining the estimates, and nearly 3 years of work have proved that the figures given were within the estimates, in fact, that the actual cost was less than the estimates. Of course, that is natural, because it was estimated at a time when materials were higher, and the contractors have had the benefit of lower prices.

I have read in the evidence also the testimony referred to by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] to the effect that the engineers gave it as their opinion that if this project were immediately constructed so they could take advantage of the low cost of materials, the cost of the work would be lower than the estimates. But, be that as it may, when we stop to think of the amount of money that our Government feels it is justified in appropriating and spending in the improvement of our harbors and rivers, the question of costs, so far as this project is concerned, is not so vitally material; and when we come to consider the question of the effect on population and industry, the beneficial effect that will result from the expenditure of the money in connection with the proposed St. Lawrence waterway will be far greater than that which has been derived from expenditures made for the improvement of rivers and harbors.

I now wish to answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. It is self-evident that the construction of this waterway is going to furnish cheap transportation from the seaway area which has been described. If it were not so, there would be no opposition to it by the railroads. That is perfectly self-evident.

It is evident that the Panama Canal furnishes cheaper transportation from one side of the continent to the other than the railroads can possibly provide. The railroads knew that would happen, and they opposed the building of the Panama Canal. Ever since the Panama Canal was built the railroads have been attempting to limit the amount of freight going through the canal or to divert it. Yet no one will deny that the Panama Canal is of tremendous economic advantage to the United States, even without considering other factors.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President and Senators, I wish to say that the railroads of this country have been benefited, in my opinion, by the construction of the Panama Canal, and I think that assertion is subject to proof and demonstration. Only 2 percent of the transcontinental freight is carried through the Panama Canal, and that freight is probably 80 percent steel. It is a character of freight as to which the time of delivery is not a material element. Ships will never carry freight on internal or intercoastal waterways where time is an essential element.

When it comes to the character of products which are destructible, such as food products and commodities that decay quickly, or such as silks and high-priced goods on which the insurance rate and the interest on the money invested run into high figures, and where quick delivery is wanted, resort will never be had to water transportation.

In my opinion, the Pacific coast commenced to boom upon the completion of the Panama Canal. It is true that the railroads lost the transportation of structural steel to Los Angeles, but what happened? With the reduced cost of structural steel on the Pacific coast, great buildings, including hotels, were erected, and practically everything used in such construction work was carried by the railroads, with the exception of the actual structural steel. The railroads lost 2 percent on low-rate freight and gained 98 percent on the increased high-rate freight.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has wholly misinterpreted my question. It had to do not with the effect the building of the St. Lawrence waterway will have upon railroad transportation but what effect it will have upon the waterway project from Chicago to the Gulf, by way of, first, the Chicago River, then the Illinois River and the Mississippi River, a waterway route which the Government has now about completed? What effect will the building of the St. Lawrence canal have on that waterway?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am sorry to say that I do not know of any intelligent estimate on the subject by competent authorities. I assume, however, that if those interested in transportation on the Mississippi River are successful in securing and maintaining at all times a 9-foot channel to the Gulf, it will greatly increase transportation on the Mississippi River, provided the railroads are not allowed to interfere with it by different characters of rates at different points.

I understand that today some of the freight, including wheat and other commodities from west of the Mississippi River, is moving on the Government barge line down the Mississippi River. I am sorry there are not more barge lines on that river, and I think there would be more such lines except for discriminations in favor of the railroads intended to prevent that traffic from increasing. I have always thought that to be so. The building of the St. Lawrence seaway would probably, in my opinion, divert some of the traffic from the Northwest and the Middle Northwest over the new route rather than down the Mississippi River, but in the long run the Mississippi Valley would gain through the general increased earnings of shippers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, of course, the Senator understands that, in order to maintain the deep waterway from Chicago to the Gulf, it is necessary to divert from Lake Michigan something like 6,000 to 10,000 cubic feet of water per minute. If we enter into this treaty, I am wondering what effect the treaty will have upon the diversion of water for a waterway that has already been established by our Government. That is the particular question to which I should like to have the Senator reply.

Mr. PITTMAN. In reply, I will say again that I know of no competent authority on the subject except the Joint Board of Engineers, and they have testified that the quantity of water permitted to go through will be sufficient for a 9-foot channel in the river leading into the Mississippi.

Mr. McKELLAR. In view of the fact that the Government already has established the deep waterway from Chicago to the Gulf, does not the Senator think that there ought to be some provision in this treaty absolutely to guarantee that sufficient water will be diverted from Lake Michigan to safeguard the Mississippi River project?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no question whatever that the waters of some of the Great Lakes, in any event, are practically the joint property of Canada and the United States. Away back in 1870, when we were afraid, for instance, that there might be some discrimination against United States traffic using the St. Lawrence River, we entered into a treaty to protect ourselves against interference with our transportation on the St. Lawrence, and to insure our receiving equal treatment. There is a comity between the two countries. There is more than that, I will say, Senators. The States bordering upon the Great Lakes, that have harbors on the Great Lakes, have an interest in those waters and have riparian rights.

The Supreme Court of the United States has discussed that subject. I do not mean to say that it has rendered a decision that might not be changed under action by Congress on some other points, but undoubtedly the present Chief Justice, acting as a commissioner or master in chancery of that court, has held that the amount of water provided in the treaty is sufficient to take care of the 9-foot channel.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I may say that the relation of the St. Lawrence waterway to the inland waterways—the Mississippi Valley system—has been covered in a report by the Army Engineers. They made an economic survey, upon which their engineering data is based, having in mind the development of the inland waterways, and they say it is apparent that the full benefit of either waterway cannot be enjoyed by the people of the central part of the United States unless both waterways shall be completed, because there will then be two competitive waterways, and the benefit of the rates resulting will be enjoyed by the people of that section of the country.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, no one knows more than myself how distracting it is to be constantly interrupted where one has a theme and a constructive idea to present to the Senate. It is not my purpose to interrupt the Senator at any length, but to call his attention to the fact that he has by error—unintentionally, of course—alluded to the Supreme Court of the United States as having expressed in its opinion that in the treaty there was provision for a water flow which, according to their judicial judgment, was sufficient. I beg to say to the able Senator that I was one of the counsel in that case—not altogether victorious. The Supreme Court in that opinion does not in anywise say that the flow is sufficient, nor in anywise pass upon the treaty. I dare say the Senator meant to say that the amount which the Supreme Court says was sufficient is the amount which is designated in the treaty.

Mr. PITTMAN. It happens to be true that it is the amount designated in the treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. I do not know; as to that there is contention. I call attention to the fact that the decision does not allude to the treaty or give it any construction whatever as to water diversion.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know that in limiting the quantity of water that may be carried through the drainage canal the amount happens to be the same that is provided in the treaty.

Mr. LEWIS. There is contention on that and much dispute.

Mr. PITTMAN. The distinguished judge who heard the case, I am sorry to say, condemned the district in Illinois and inferentially somebody else, whoever it was, for not carrying out their part of the understanding.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I do not wish constantly to interrupt the Senator, but on that first point will he yield to me for a moment?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure the Senator will agree that in the case in the Supreme Court of the United States the question of the right of the United States to divert the water from Lake Michigan for navigation purposes was not before the court and it was specifically so held. In that connection, I should simply like to direct the Senator's attention to this language of the court on page 182 in the decision reported in Two Hundred and Eighty-first United States Reports:

> The court expressly held that Congress had not attempted to authorize any diversion for navigation purposes on the Illinois or Mississippi Rivers and that no diversion of water for such purposes could be allowed in this case. The master has specifically found that there has been no subsequent action by the Congress.

Nevertheless, a few months after the handing down of this decision Congress did specifically authorize the Lakes-to-the-Gulf project, which essentially changed the situation in view of the Supreme Court decision.

Mr. PITTMAN. However, subsequently, as the Senator will recall, when the motion to increase the quantity of water sought in their petition and to include navigation was made, it was denied by the master who took the evidence in the case.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to ask the Senator one more question and then I will not take any more of his time. The Senator from Nevada surely would not want our contact with a foreign country to interfere with the deep waterway from Chicago to the Gulf which the Government has already practically constructed? The Senator would not want to do that, would he?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; and I do not believe the ratification of the treaty would do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to have the Senator's assurance that he does not want to do that. I think it can be firmly and fixedly put in this agreement that there shall be no question about the use of the necessary water from Lake Michigan—which is entirely in American territory—to keep that deep waterway from Chicago to the Gulf in operation.

Mr. PITTMAN. I may say that——

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator from Tennessee, I presume, alludes to a reservation which might be made to the treaty?

Mr. McKELLAR. I allude to a reservation which might be made.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. It is urged by its opponents that the treaty contains no limitation against Canada's diverting any water from the Great Lakes, but that there is a limitation on the United States diverting water from the Great Lakes. It is further urged that that provision in the treaty is an unjust discrimination against the United States. I should like to have the Senator's view on that subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is a clause in the treaty that guarantees to this project an equal benefit in the waters by virtue of this agreement. There is also a provision in the treaty prohibiting both Governments from diverting or transferring water out of the watershed without the unanimous consent of the joint commission; and there is still another clause the interpretation of which by the State Department is that if an emergency should arise calling for more water to be diverted from the Lakes and they cannot agree upon it, the question will be submitted to arbitration. That is the emergency clause in the treaty.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator have any doubt that under article VI of this treaty Canada would have an absolute right to build a canal from the Georgian Bay to the Ottawa River and take such water as they pleased from the Georgian Bay, which is on the same level as Lake Michigan and Lake Huron, and would have undoubtedly the same effect as taking water from Lake Michigan?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think article VIII prohibits it; but if that is not true, a reservation would be perfectly proper, and, so far as I am concerned, I would not oppose it.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator that I propose to offer a reservation striking out that portion of the treaty, and putting a limitation on the diversion of water from Lake Michigan. I intend to offer such a reservation to article VI limiting the diversion from the waters of the Georgian Bay to 1,500 second-feet.

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very glad to hear the Senator's views on these matters. I have an opinion, of course, as to what the State Department deems the treaty means, but, as in the case of every treaty on which I have had to act here, personally when I was in any doubt in regard to the meaning I have never hesitated at all to support reservations that might make provisions plain.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject, let me say it is also urged that Lake Michigan is a part of the Territory of the United States; Lake Michigan belongs exclusively to the United States; that a distinction should be made between the waters of Lake Michigan and the waters of the other Lakes; and that it would be a surrendering of American sovereignty pro tanto over Lake Michigan to permit this diversion. I should like the Senator's view on that point.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I will say to the distinguished judge that I do not agree with him; I will be prepared to argue that question at some other time; but I do not like to be diverted into an argument as to whether connected waters, such as are the Great Lakes now, which finally naturally empty in a foreign country, have ever been considered so in the sovereignty of the one country that it would not treat with the other country with regard to the use of the water in its own territory. That is something we cannot afford to do. Our whole relationship with Canada has been one of friendship and agreement. She could possibly cut us off from going down the St. Lawrence River at all; and yet even today a tremendous amount of freight originating in the United States and belonging to citizens of the United States does move on the St. Lawrence River. We cannot carry nationalism to the point where we will say, "We will not treat with you with regard to waters exclusively in our territory where the waters are connected with waters exclusively in your country." I contend that such a theory of exclusive sovereignty would injure us more than it would injure our neighbor. We cannot afford to take such a position as that.

Mr. LEWIS. May I say to the able Senator from Nevada, responding equally to the query of the Senator from Louisiana, that the matter he is now discussing is treated in connection with the treaty of 1909 and referred to there specifically both as evidence given and in a statement from the then Secretary of State, Mr. Root. To a query by the late Senator Bacon, of the Foreign Relations Committee, there will be found the reply of Mr. Root that these situations in no wise authorize Lake Michigan to be treated as anything else than as a sovereign water within the United States that could not be invaded or treated as an international water. I invite the able Senator—I will not interrupt him again; it is not fair to him—to take a little moment, and he will see that as to that treaty, which is modified by the present treaty, he will find full discussion and information of the suggestion propounded by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. PITTMAN. I take no issue as to that. There is not any question that we have exclusive sovereignty over Lake Michigan, as there is not any question that Canada has exclusive sovereignty over the St. Lawrence River where it is exclusively within her borders. I say that when our Government enters into an agreement with regard to water over which it has sovereignty in consideration of Canada entering into an agreement concerning waters over which she has sovereignty, we are not surrendering our sovereignty; of course not; we are bringing about something of mutual benefit to both countries.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. DIETERICH. I will ask if it is not a fact that, when the United States achieved their independence, there was a rule of international law, according to which, where a river connected two or more countries and flowed through one country which owned and controlled both banks, all nations along that river had a right to its use? I will ask, furthermore, if it is not a fact that Great Britain invoked a change in international law in reference to the St. Lawrence River and denied our citizens the right to the free navigation of that river?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and she has the right to do it now.

Mr. DIETERICH. She did not until the St. Lawrence River caused her to adopt that new rule of international law against us.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but unfortunately it is a privilege of sovereignty, and it cannot possibly be overcome except by agreement. I take it we could keep every Canadian citizen off of Lake Michigan——

Mr. DIETERICH. Pardon me if I interrupt the Senator at that point. Is it not a fact that Great Britain made this a matter of sovereignty; that prior to that time all nations bordering upon a stream that furnished an outlet for a nation had a right to the joint navigation of those waters, and that she made it a matter of international law that where one nation owned both banks of the stream it had complete control of that river?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly, and similar agreements have been made and entered into from time immemorial. We hope it is never violated. We have had the same condition on the Danube and on other rivers. However, it was recognized that it took a treaty to overcome sovereignty. We had trouble over a little river out in the West that rose in Montana and flowed into Canada and back into the United States. It was possibly within the power of the United States to have diverted that water before it went into Canada, but because of the natural justice of one country to another the International Joint Commission settled that little matter satisfactorily. There is no doubt in my opinion that we have the power to empty the Great Lakes into the Mississippi River. I do not know what Canada could do about it. We have the power, just exactly as they have the power to stop us from going through their territory.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. O'MAHONEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield further to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. DIETERICH. I will ask if it is not a fact that in the recent treaty between the United States and Canada when we were considering the matter of diverting 10,000 second-feet of water to the Illinois and Mississippi Rivers for the purpose of navigation and whatever other purposes it might be used for, there was a readjustment of power rights at Niagara taken into consideration, in which Canada was granted the use of more water at those rapids than the United States had on account of the supposition that we would divert 10,000 second-feet?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know.

Mr. DIETERICH. If that is a fact would it not be proper then to readjust those power rights at Niagara if they are going to shut down on diversion down the Mississippi?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know. I do not know what agreements ought to be made between Canada and the United States with regard to various matters. I think we ought always to try to agree with regard to those waters. I hope we can do so because I know that if we do not it is within the power of both parties to injure tremendously the use of those waters for the other party.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As a layman I would not inject myself into a debate respecting international law, but when I confront a problem of that sort it is my usual practice to go to headquarters for the answer. The subject respecting the sovereignty of Lake Michigan was submitted by me with a categorical questionnaire to the State Department. The State Department responded unequivocally in support of the view which the Senator from Nevada is now presenting. With the Senator's permission I would like to insert in the RECORD at this point a memorandum from the State Department.

Mr. PITTMAN. I would rather have it appear at the conclusion of my remarks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Very well. I ask permission that the memorandum be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Nevada.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit A.)

Mr. PITTMAN. In article VIII of the treaty occurs this clause:

(b) That no diversion of water, other than the diversion referred to in paragraph (a) of this article, from the Great Lakes system or from the international section to another watershed shall hereafter be made except by authorization of the International Joint Commission.

I think that answers the proposition that Canada is not restrained as much in the diversion of water from the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence as we are.

I find that the chief opposition to the treaty is not because of the wording of the treaty. I believe there is not a Senator who would have any objection to any reservation that would tend to make clear any protection to which the United States is entitled. But it is not the treaty itself that is meeting with opposition. It is the program the treaty is intended to carry out. We all know that.

We cannot disguise the fact that the real opposition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York City is not directed at the treaty but deals with the fact that it provides for opening navigation to the interior of the country through the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BACHMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. Could not the Senator say the same thing about the cost, that the question of cost is not the matter to which they object, but the carrying out of the program itself to which those who object are opposed? It is not the language of the treaty to which they object.

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly that is true. I have formed my opinion from what I have heard and read.

Of course, the city of New York has a great harbor. It has the greatest shipping in the United States. It attracts freight from all directions. It may lose some of that freight. In other words, if we increase the carrying capacity of water carriers from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic Ocean, New York City will lose some freight that now comes by rail to the port of New York. There is no doubt about that. But if the waterway is going to reduce the cost of transportation, is it not justified?

Raw materials, both mineral and agricultural, are the principal products that travel by the slower means of water transportation. In the matter of farm products every charge for transportation is not taken out of the consumer but is taken out of the pocket of the farmer, and we know it. We do not have to argue that point. If a farmer sells hay for $22 a ton in Omaha and the freight rate is $12.50, it is not added to the retail price of hay because it would be said, "We cannot sell the hay for more than $24", but it is taken out of the actual cost of production of the farmer. That is largely true of every raw product.

There is not any doubt whatever that it is to the interest of all the people of this country to reduce the cost of transportation; that it is of higher importance to us than to maintain the prosperity of any port. I contend that we would be entitled to take away 10,000,000 tons from the port of New York and give it to the St. Lawrence waterway if on that 10,000,000 tons a substantial sum were saved to the shippers of this country; and that is the argument, that the construction of the waterway will do it.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. May I ask the Senator if it would not be the best method for the redistribution of wealth that he knows, or at least if it would not be a better method than that of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] to redistribute it through taxation? Would not distributing industries and leaving with the people money that they otherwise would have to pay for transportation charges, be a most effective method for redistributing the wealth of the country?

Mr. PITTMAN. Undoubtedly. I think the way to redistribute wealth is through redistributing opportunities, and that is what we are trying to do.

I have given illustrations. I can understand why the Chamber of Commerce of New York City are fighting this project, because they will lose some freight. I can understand why other great Atlantic cities are opposing this project, because they will lose some freight. They will lose freight, however, because it can be transported cheaper through the St. Lawrence River than by rail to those ports. Otherwise, they would not lose it. So the whole issue comes down to whether we are going to benefit these ports by compelling the shipper to pay a higher price to ship his freight to the seaboard, or whether we are going to benefit the shipper by permitting him to pay a lower cost by shipping through the canal.

That is the only issue in this whole matter. No one denies that freight can be shipped cheaper through the canal than by rail, because if it could not be shipped cheaper the railroads would not worry about it. I do not have to prove that point.

Now let us see where this selfishness is going to lead us. The harbor of New York wants no freight diverted from it. It wants it all. The harbor of New York has fought and will continue to fight any development of the Mississippi River if it is going to take freight to New Orleans away from the harbor of New York; and if the harbor of Boston can do anything to prevent the development of the harbor of New Orleans or Norfolk or Baltimore, it will do it.

What have we? We have selfish seaports here, doing everything in their power to prevent a reduction in the cost of shipment across this country and shipment to foreign countries. That is what we have. Added to that we have the powerful railroad interest in this country, fighting the same things. They have fought the Panama Canal. They have fought every development of our internal waterways, and they will continue to fight such development.

I do not blame them, except in the sense that I think their philosophy is wrong. From the way they view the matter that they are going to lose some traffic if this seaway is built, their opposition is a natural, selfish thing, as it is natural and selfish for the port of New York or any other port to fight for its interest. But here we have all of those interests combined, and not one of them is thinking about the shipper of this country—not one. There are 90 percent of the people to be benefited on one side and 10 percent on the other side. That is the fight in this case.

What will be the ultimate end of it? When you come in here, you gentlemen from the Mississippi River section of this country, who for years and years have received appropriations for that river, what will happen? You will have a bloc from the West that say, "Your river interferes with our selection of transportation; we will therefore block you." You will have one harbor fighting another harbor; and in between, and helping all fight each other, you will have the railroads.

By that selfish philosophy these interests are driving as rapidly as they can to prevent forever not only the further improvement of the rivers of this country but the improvement of the harbors. That is where they are driving.

But let us see. The railroad managers of this country have now gone out to their employees, to the brotherhoods, and told them to wire to their Senators and Congressmen to oppose the building of this project to open up the interior country to the sea, because it will take some traffic away from some railroads and throw them out of employment.

In the first place, the railroads have never been able to demonstrate that that is true. Their experience with the Panama Canal has been just exactly the opposite. The canal by carrying a tremendous amount of heavy freight to the Pacific coast, where time is not the essence of the movement, a building boom was started out there. Prosperity followed, and 2 percent of the resulting freight went to water transportation and 98 percent went to the railroads.

The railroads of this country do not realize that they cannot have traffic unless people can buy. They do not realize that they cannot have traffic if the cost of transportation, plus the cost of production, eats up all the profit. There is no such thing.

I say that, in my opinion, the policy of the railroads has been antiquated. I was on the Interstate Commerce Committee for a number of years, and, in my opinion, the railroad industry is the most antiquated industry in the country. The very selfishness of the railroads has almost destroyed them. They have brought themselves down to a point where they could not exist without borrowing probably $400,000,000 from the Government of the United States. Why? Because they did not consider that weight was an element of cost. They have had heavy rails, heavy roadbeds, long, slow-moving, dragging freight trains that had to be broken up every hundred miles for distribution, in an effort to save employing two or three brakemen on a train; and the cost of slowness, the cost of great foundations for the rails, the cost of breaking up those trains at sidetracks was 20 times the cost of running fast trains oftener with more employees.

Whenever the railroads had deficits, whenever their mismanagement and their antiquated methods were driving them to bankruptcy, their only philosophy has been to go to the Interstate Commerce Commission and get an order to raise freight rates; and they have raised freight rates until shippers cannot ship, and there is not any freight. That is their philosophy.

Everyone knows that the automobile industry realized that it took a certain amount of power to move a certain weight, and they started to reduce the weight of automobiles by using aluminum and other materials. They realized that speed was essential to economy, and they started to build their automobiles for speed. It has been only in the last year that there was enough progressivism in the railroad management of this country to realize that that was a factor in earnings, and now two or three railroads have built aluminum or duralumin cars that are only one fifth as heavy as the other cars they were pulling. They realize that they have to have smaller trains, running faster and at more frequent periods of time.

Germany found that out years ago; but the stockbrokers who own the railroads of the United States would not let the managers of the railroads do what the managers knew ought to be done. They did not care anything about it until they got into bankruptcy. Now they go out to these poor railroad men, probably one third of whom are idle as a result of the inability of the railroads to carry freight, and lead them to believe that "All you have to do is to block up the Panama Canal, and not let the St. Lawrence Canal be built, and our railroads will be carrying trainloads for all time", when they know that the whole amount of freight that is carried through the Panama Canal is only 2 percent of the transcontinental freight alone; when they know that even if this canal is built here it will probably in no case carry over 25,000,000 tons a year, and they know that that freight will be carried to water points, and from the water points transferred into the interior, by rail—whether it goes from the Great Lakes to New York or Baltimore or New Orleans—it goes there for distribution in the interior, because 74 percent of the freight that will be carried through the river and the canals will have a destination back in the United States. Yet I say to you the railroads will try to enlist in their opposition these poor railroad brotherhood men, who have been idle largely through the action of these people themselves, who run a train so long that you can hardly see from one end of it to another, and drag its weary length across this country, breaking it up every hundred miles or so, so as to save carrying two or three more brakemen.

If railroading is to be successful, it will have to be made modern. You cannot expect a man to refrain from flying on an airplane, if he is not afraid to fly, when he can come across this country by air in 24 hours and it takes him 4 or 5 days to come by rail. Let the railroads modernize a four-track system across this country, make a trip in 24 hours that now requires 48, and run trains every hour; instead of having the weight of the train a thousand times the weight of the passengers on it, reduce the weight of the trains, run them often, run them quickly, and they will get back the traffic.

Those are some of the modern ideas of railroad managers. They are trying them; but, for heaven's sake, let them stop this absurd, dishonest policy of attempting to convince their employees that all they need to do is to dam up the Panama Canal and not build another waterway and they will have all the freight they want.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. It need not be stated to the learned Senator from Nevada that much of the opposition of the railroads to the Panama Canal naturally arose from the standing conflict between the financial interests of shippers and carriers. The transcontinental railroads, as they foresaw would be the case, following the Canal's construction, were obliged to lower their rates to meet on the Pacific coast, subject to the railroads' quick-delivery advantage, the more or less competitive all-water rates from the Atlantic coast. The prize to be won by the transcontinental railroads, if they were able, as the Senator has suggested, to block the movement of traffic by the Panama Canal, would be the higher transcontinental railroad rates which could then be charged.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is no doubt but that they know that water transportation is cheaper. What they do not know is what Germany already knows. Germany owns the railroads on both sides of the Rhine running parallel with the Rhine, but the boats on the Rhine are privately owned—and there are thousands of them—each boat tows 10 or 12 large barges moving along the Rhine with iron and coal and lumber, and other heavy materials which are indestructible, where time of delivery is not an important element, while the railroads running on each bank are running their trains rapidly, one right after the other, with the cars so arranged that a derrick lifts the freight off onto a truck and delivery is made. Germany could stop the water transportation on the Rhine if it wanted to, but Germany knows that it is not practicable to compel the railroads to haul the kind of freight carried on the boats, and that it is practicable to have the boats haul it. The German Government was interested in the prosperity of the shipper, because when the shipper prospered in shipping his raw materials, his coal and his iron and his lumber, he bought in Berlin, and Cologne, and other places, and the railroads carried back to him the goods he thus purchased. Germany understands that problem; but there are no railroad managers in this country. There are a lot of stockbrokers in charge of the railroads. There are some able railroad men in charge of transportation, but they haye no more influence with their boards of directors than any of us would have.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator mentioned the up-to-date and modern railway systems of Germany. I should like to remind the Senate that not only is the Senator's statement accurate, but Germany spends hundreds of millions of dollars to develop her inland waterways. It is possible to load freight on barges on German inland waterways, take it down to the sea, put it on a boat, and take it across the Atlantic, through the Panama Canal, and land it at Seattle for less than it costs to transport the same freight from the Mississippi Valley to Seattle.

Is it not true that if the proposed waterway is built we will get the benefit of the Panama Canal for the interior part of the country, and can compete with those sending freight across the Atlantic to the Pacific coast through the Panama Canal, and can compete with the waterways of Germany?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is absolutely true.

Mr. OVERTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. OVERTON. I think there may be much force in the argument which the Senator makes in reference to selfish local interests trying to oppose improvements which would militate against their success; but carrying that thought to its logical conclusion, is it not true that it is rather selfish to take the position that a treaty should provide for the use in an unlimited way of all of the waters of the Great Lakes for a seaway through the St. Lawrence River into the ocean, and rather selfishly provide that there should be a limitation on the amount of water which could be diverted for the use of the Lakes-to-the-Gulf-of-Mexico waterway?

Mr. PITTMAN. In the first place, Mr. President, in the pending treaty both Governments agree not to divert the waters of the Lakes or from the St. Lawrence River into any other watershed. Second, they make an exception for the diversion of water from the Lakes into another American watershed. I think that is quite reasonable. In other words, had I been a Canadian, if I were going to agree that water might not be diverted from lakes over which I had sovereignty into the Arctic Ocean, if they were going to make an exception in favor of the United States, I would expect to limit it at least to the diversion of water from the Lakes to some other watershed. The people on the St. Lawrence River are interested in the headwaters of that river from the standpoint of navigation. We are interested in the waters of the Lakes by reason of navigation, and we are both agreed that that water shall not be diverted out of the watershed in which it exists, because the present watershed is inhabited and commerce and trade are carried there, and neither country should destroy it. We have agreed in the treaty that it shall not be destroyed without the consent of both Governments, and the only exception is the diversion by our Government of water from the Lakes to the Mississippi watershed. Whether it is enough or not enough is a legitimate question to consider and debate, I will say to the Senator from Louisiana. If it is not enough, and it can be made enough without destroying the rights of our neighbor—and I think it can be—then that should be done; but that is the only question within the treaty, because, as far as the treaty is concerned, it does not allow either Government to divert the water from the watershed.

There is not much more I desire to say on this subject. I think we are getting to a deplorable condition in this country when none of us is permitted to think nationally, when all of us have to think in terms of a State, in terms of a county, in terms of a town. The arguments from every source have been based on that selfish viewpoint. No one here has dared to deny that making our rivers navigable would reduce the cost of transportation to every shipper who lives in territory tributary to the river. There is no argument on that.

Mr. POPE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. POPE. I have been very much impressed with the statement of the Senator with reference to the interest of the ports of New York and Boston and other places. Has the Senator any figures as to what would be the probable loss of freight to those ports?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no; I have not. It could be figured very easily, however. We could take the present tonnage which goes through the canal, say 6,000,000 tons a year, and double that, if we want to. In 25 years it would probably be three times that and that would end it.

In a great city like New York, which has probably one twentieth of the population of the United States and has business converging to it from all over the country, it probably means little, while the reduction in the cost to the farmers and merchants along the seaway would be an enormous factor.

Someone has said that this matter refers only to the farmer. It might be said that the farmers in the area to be affected constitute, I think, 50 percent of the producers of this country. Let us take Indiana, for instance, as a typical example. I have before me the testimony of ex-Gov. J. P. Goodrich, of Indiana, who made a statement before the Senate committee which was never denied and never controverted. Listen to this from Governor Goodrich:

> Indiana is an agricultural State of some consequence. I think it is fifth in the amount of corn produced, but it is primarly a great cattle-raising and dairy and poultry State from an agricultural viewpoint. It is also a great manufacturing State, and the sound commerce of our State is of considerable importance to us. Last year the foreign trade of Indiana was in excess of $100,000,000. The exportations alone were $55,623,625.
> Of that $13,584,835 in automobiles and parts went all over the world; lard, $5,769,846. Those two items alone do not cover the bacon, large quantities of which were exported. Industrial machinery, $5,165,270; plows, $2,165,000. We have the largest plow factory in the world outside the General Harvester. Those are the principal items in the something over $100,000,000 of foreign commerce of the State of Indiana.
> We believe that the opening up of this waterway will greatly facilitate the growth of industry in our State, and we are looking forward to the time when we are to have a balanced production, enough industry, and men working in factories and offices to consume the products of the farms, which would be from my viewpoint an ideal situation.
> We know that the opening of this waterway will greatly aid our manufacturers in exporting their products. We are not guessing at it. There was a shipload of automobiles sent out of South Bend to the South American trade last year. It went out in a ship that brought into Michigan City in the north end of our State, about 7 miles from South Bend, some clay products that we need in manufacturing; and it saved in freight $25 on each automobile shipped, besides the facility of handling. It avoided the expense of crating and of storage charges in New York and other expensive terminal charges in that city. We were able to load them at Michigan City and send them to their destination.
> Senator VANDENBERG. Was that the Studebaker Corporation?
> Mr. GOODRICH. Yes. With a saving of $25 apiece on automobiles Studebaker Co. would have saved $416,250, and placed them in a highly advantageous position in competing in the markets of the world for the exportation of their products.

He refers to others, including the Oliver Plow Works.

Then he is asked about imports, and he finds that the imports were almost the same as the exports.

These things are very plain when the testimony in connection with all of these matters is read. The actual experience shows that there would be a tremendous saving in freight rates.

If any Senator desires to rise and say that he is opposed to the reduction of freight rates, I have no argument with him. I am through. If any Senator desires to rise and state that he is more interested in the port of New York than he is in probably 35 percent of all the industries of the country, I am willing to take issue with him.

I do not wish to be misunderstood. If there are Senators who believe that from a legal standpoint the treaty does not fairly carry out the purposes as intended for the United States, that is another question. I think the legal advisers of our Government intended that all our interests shall be fully protected in the treaty. That, however, is another matter.

Let us see a little more about the area that is interested in this matter.

The wholesale and retail trade in the seaway area affords a basis for appraising the demand for foreign and domestic imports.

The wholesale trade of the area in 1929 (including only those States wholly within it) totaled $22,727,535,000 out of a country-wide total of $69,291,547,000. That is the ratio.

The predominance of domestic over foreign commerce in the water-borne commerce of the United States is a highly important factor which must be considered in appraising the effect of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway on the several coast lines and ports interested directly or indirectly in the development.

In the 10 years 1923 to 1932, inclusive, the domestic coastwise and intercoastal trade of the country comprised approximately four fifths of the total water-borne commerce. I called attention to that a while ago.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what the figures were; a total of what?

Mr. PITTMAN. In the 10 years 1923 to 1932, inclusive, the domestic coastwise and intercoastal trade of the country comprised approximately four fifths of the total water-borne commerce.

Mr. DIETERICH. I should like to get the figures which the Senator gave before as to the States bordering on this waterway.

Mr. PITTMAN. The separate figures?

Mr. DIETERICH. Yes; the separate figures as to the States which will be directly affected by this particular waterway.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not have the separate figures here. I will supply them to the Senator. They are very easily obtainable. They are contained in the report of the Department of Commerce.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator consider that this particular improvement would aid the import trade of the State of Kentucky?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I do not know——

Mr. DIETERICH. Kentucky is partly included, as I understand, within this area.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator does not believe that this proposed waterway would aid the import trade of Kentucky?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not in my opinion. I am just guessing at it, however. It might reduce freight rates. It would probably aid Kentucky in its export trade.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator know what amount of coal Kentucky now exports to Canada for use in Canadian factories, and so forth?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; I do not.

Mr. DIETERICH. Does the Senator know it is a fact that Kentucky does export some coal to Canada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I know that Kentucky does export some coal to Canada.

Mr. DIETERICH. Would Kentucky export any more coal if this seaway were built?

Mr. PITTMAN. Where would Canada get the coal?

Mr. DIETERICH. Canada would get it from across the ocean.

Mr. PITTMAN. Why is it not brought across the ocean to Montreal now?

Mr. DIETERICH. I understand coal is brought across the ocean.

Mr. PITTMAN. Canada does take in coal from across the ocean.

Mr. DIETERICH. Bringing it to Montreal; yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. As I understand, there are only two or three points in Canada to which we do ship some coal. Suppose Canada did cut off the market for Kentucky coal; I suppose the Senator would vote against a general provision for the reduction of freight rates.

Mr. DIETERICH. Suppose it also cut off the market for Illinois coal and West Virginia coal. What would the Senator say as to that?

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say to the Senator that if Canada did cut off the export of coal from Kentucky and that part of the country, that would be a very insignificant matter upon which to base opposition to the construction of a waterway which, according to the estimates, touches 52 percent of the industries of this country.

Mr. DIETERICH. One of the things to take into consideration, however, regardless of whether or not it would be controlling, is whether our own people would be injured in the manner we have just discussed.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is hardly anything on earth that can be done that is progressive which does not injure somebody or something that is not progressive. The argument has always been used on the floor of the Senate by ultraconservatives that if something is done which is progressive, someone who is not progressive will be injured. Take the change that occurred in the transition from the old sailing vessel to the steamship. It put nearly every sailing vessel out of business. It was a disastrous thing. I should assume that the people living in Massachusetts and Maine, where they built ships, would have voted overwhelmingly against any effort upon the part of our Government to build steam vessels. Again, when we left the steam vessels and commenced to subsidize railroads, we took away a lot of freight from the steam vessels; and then, of course, there was the demand that we should not build railroads.

Now, when we get airships that furnish faster transportation, and when we get trucks and automobiles that are moving across the country, again, instead of the railroads moving progressively to meet the situation, they are crying, "We pay the taxes. You built us up. You own our bonds. We cannot pay the interest and the principal on our bonds. Therefore, do not progress."

Mr. DIETERICH. Will the Senator answer a further question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. DIETERICH. What effect would the proposed waterway have on the Erie Canal in New York State?

Mr. PITTMAN. How much freight does the Erie Canal carry?

Mr. DIETERICH. Well, is the Erie Canal capable of development?

Mr. PITTMAN. How much freight does it carry?

Mr. DIETERICH. I am not informed on that; but it does carry some freight. The Erie Canal is built. It is entirely within the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask the Senator how much freight it carries.

Mr. DIETERICH. I am not informed on that. I am very sorry, but I have not looked the matter up and cannot say. Naturally, however, it carries some freight.

Mr. PITTMAN. I know the amount is insignificant.

Mr. DIETERICH. It carries as much as the International Rapids does now, does it not?

Mr. PITTMAN. Supposing it does carry as much as the International Rapids carries now; therefore the Senator would not improve the International Rapids because of the Erie Canal?

Mr. DIETERICH. Therefore I think it would be better for us to develop a waterway within our own territory.

Mr. PITTMAN. I can see very clearly why the Senator would do that if the Senator lived in the State of New York or the city of New York, because the people living there urge that very strongly; but all of the engineers who have passed on this question have held that the other proposed route is uneconomic in comparison with the St. Lawrence Waterway.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator says, "All of the engineers who have passed on this question." What question has the Senator in mind?

Mr. PITTMAN. They passed on the best means of bringing the sea to the Great Lakes, and they took into consideration the all-American canal and an all-American transportation system.

Mr. DIETERICH. The Senator has a chance to have that done.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but it is a very poor chance. If this economic program cannot get by the Congress of this country over the opposition railroads and selfish ports, then the uneconomic propositions that might be suggested certainly would not get by.

I do not want to go into the other questions here, except that I do wish to place in the RECORD a few more statistics for the benefit of those who may see fit to read them at sometime.

The predominance of domestic commerce over foreign is not only characteristic of the water-borne commerce of the United States as a whole but also of the various separate coasts and ports. Thus, in 1930 the ratio of domestic to total water-borne commerce was 82 percent for the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, 70 percent for the ports of the Gulf coast, and 84 percent for ports of the Pacific coast. The enormous Great Lakes tonnage is, of course, overwhelmingly domestic—92 percent.

Those figures are not segregated by ports but by sections where the ports are located. I will try to get the figures as to the individual ports.

It is reasonable to believe, therefore, that at least 80 percent of the new traffic that will be developed by the improvement of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will be domestic commerce moving between the ports on the Great Lakes and the existing ports on the Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts.

This suggests that the ports on the other coasts will be more largely benefited by the growth of intercoastal commerce moving via the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence waterway than they can be injured by changes in the movement of foreign commerce occasioned thereby. The Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific ports, with their already important movement of domestic water-borne commerce, will have the added advantage of direct ocean trade routes to the new Great Lakes-St. Lawrence coast serving an area incomparable both as a source of products and as a market for the goods produced in other areas.

In other words, if it be granted that some of the Atlantic and Gulf ports may suffer some loss of foreign commerce, which now moves through them by a combination of rail-and-water transportation, this disadvantage would be more than offset by reason of the great increase in domestic commerce with the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence ports which will develop as soon as the seaway is opened for navigation.

POTENTIAL COMMERCE BY SEAWAY

The completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway will enable 70 percent of the world's ocean-going freight-cargo tonnage to reach the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence River ports which serve the important industrial, agricultural, and commercial area described above. The potential export and import tonnage which will move via the seaway, based on 1929 conditions, is conservatively estimated in a special study prepared by the War Department at 13,000,000 tons, and the savings in transportation costs as compared with present available routes at approximately $79,000,000.

These conclusions rest on the following analysis:

The ocean-going merchant marine of the chief maritime nations of the world, consisting of vessels of 2,000 tons or over, as of December 31, 1932, totaled 9,358 vessels, with a total tonnage of 51,000,000. Of this total 6,938 vessels with a total tonnage of 30,000,000, have a draft, fully loaded, of 26 feet or less.

The freight-cargo vessels included in the above total 6,707 vessels, with a total tonnage of 31,000,000; of this total 5,457, with a combined tonnage of 22,000,000, have a draft, fully loaded, of 26 feet or less.

These figures indicate that approximately 60 percent of the world's ocean-going tonnage and 70 percent of its freight-cargo tonnage can utilize the proposed seaway to promote the commerce of the interior of the continent.

Possible export and import commerce over the proposed St. Lawrence waterway, based on 1929 conditions, is estimated at 23,000,000 tons. Certain corrections arbitrarily made in an effort to be conservative reduce this estimate to a more probable figure of 13,000,000 tons. Potential exports via the waterway include wheat and grain products, meats and animal fats, manufactured iron, chemicals, automobiles, agricultural implements, and copper. Potential imports include sugar, rubber and rubber substitutes, coffee, bananas, kaolin, vegetable oil, manganese, and pyrites.

Further analysis reveals that as a whole the potential export and import trade is fairly well balanced, and that even when broken down on a zone basis there is considerable possibility of two-way loading. On the basis on which these estimates are prepared partial loading through the St. Lawrence canals for vessels of greater draft than indicated by the canal depth, with additional cargo picked up through detour to North Atlantic ports, would be economically profitable whenever the additional pick-up exceeded 300 tons.

An analysis was made of certain commodities which were regarded as important potential tonnage for the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. The present costs of transportation of 6 export and 5 import commodities were compared with the possible costs that might result through development of the proposed seaway.

These savings and the basis for the figures arrived at are shown in detail in the report of the War Department. On the basis indicated therein it is shown that in 1929 there might have been moved over the proposed seaway a total of exports of 7,741,500 tons, with a possible saving of $44,810,923, and an import movement of 5,742,333 tons, with a possible saving of $34,082,207. It should be noted that these figures are for the year 1929 and are obtained on the basis of the best possible transportation costs and assuming the most favorable conditions.

In the comparisons actual vessel costs were used for both prospective seaway and present ocean transportation. Full vessel loading was also assumed and the figures for tonnage were based on commerce for the calendar year 1929. Full allowance in seaway vessel costs was made for insurance and pilotage, as well as for a reduction in tonnage due to the winter period in which the St. Lawrence will be closed to navigation. In using rail rates, commodity rates were used where available.

This saving of over $70,000,000 a year affecting both the producer and the consumer is based entirely upon foreign commerce. As stated above, our water-borne foreign commerce is only one fifth of the total water-borne commerce of the United States.

It has been impossible to derive from authentic sources the amount with origin and destination of purely domestic commerce. There are appended in the War Department annex tabulations showing existing ocean freight rates compared with published tariffs for land transportation. A consideration of the producers' and consumers' market which will be opened up to deep-water transportation by the development of the proposed seaway with a comparison of the land and ocean rates will indicate in some small measure the benefits to domestic commerce which will be developed through the proposed improvement.

Typical savings in such domestic shipments, assuming return cargo available, were $5.44 to $12.64 per ton on lumber from Grays Harbor, Wash., to Detroit, Mich.; $9.332 per ton on class-5 commodities from Philadelphia to Chicago; $84.947 per ton on automobiles from Detroit to Los Angeles.

COORDINATION OF TRANSPORTATION AGENCIES

Adequate appraisal of the proposed seaway must include an attempt to estimate future traffic requirements of the area affected and to allocate such traffic between the seaway and existing transportation agencies. So far as the various indices afford a basis for such an estimate, it is clear that an upward trend is still characteristic both of population and of per capita freight traffic.

Interstate Commerce Commission figures show that railroad freight ton-miles increased from an average of 167,712,000,000 in the 5 years, 1901–5, to an average of 430,378,000,000 for the 5 years, 1926–30, and that, with the exception of the abnormal war period the rate of increase has been remarkably steady, with no sign of diminution. This is significant in view of the fact that recent years have been characterized by increasing competition on waterways and highways.

I digress to emphasize the fact that rail transportation has been steadily and rapidly increasing throughout the country in spite of the tremendous competition it has met from automobiles and public trucks and busses.

The trend would indicate a demand for about 650,000,000,000 ton-miles of freight traffic in 1950, an increase of 200,000,000,000 ton-miles as compared with the 1929 peak.

A similar analysis based on population growth and increase in per capita ton-miles of traffic suggests approximately the same conclusion and warrants the conviction that by 1950 the increase in traffic offered to the country's transportation agencies will be at least 30 times the probable traffic via the seaway.

That probably answers some of the questions that have been asked as to what portion of the traffic will be carried by this seaway. It will probably be one thirtieth of that carried by other transportation agencies.

Mr. President, here is a description which I will not take the time to read, it being entirely statistical, but I think it should come in at this point.

Mr. President, it must be understood, and it is, I think, generally understood that this is not a new waterway. The waterway already exists. The Lakes are connected; they empty into the St. Lawrence River, which runs into the ocean. We already have the new Welland Canal; we have other waterways. These connections between the Lakes in places will have to be deepened, and there will have to be two dams built on the international boundary for the purpose of making two great reservoirs or two lakes, which will carry ships of a depth of 26 or 27 feet. That is the proposition.

There will be available tomorrow, I hope, the Senate document which was ordered printed containing the President's message, and the accompanying documents. Among those are several maps of the kind which I have here [exhibiting] showing graphically the area affected by the seaway and also a graphic description of the work to be done on the river under the treaty. That will be available to the Senate. I believe the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] has already asked that the statement by the State Department be published at the end of my remarks.

I had intended to discuss two other phases of this question but will not do so at this time. It is hardly necessary to discuss the power question as connected with this project. I do not know of anyone who disputes any of the questions affecting power. It is admitted that this project will generate 2,200,000 hydroelectric horsepower and that it will be the cheapest power in the world. The cost of the power generated will be 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour.

I think the cheapest estimated power in the United States is that estimated to be generated at Boulder Dam and that will be 1¾ mills per kilowatt-hour, or, carried into figures that we might understand more clearly, it would be about $7 to $8 per horsepower per annum. That power, under the treaty, is to be allocated to the State of New York in consideration of the State contributing $89,000,000 of the money allocated to our Government to be contributed as its part of the cost. That 1,000,000 horsepower is nearly half of all the power used in the State of New York today and would be one of the greatest assets to every industry in the State that possibly can be given.

We are developing some great water powers, as the President stated in his message. We are not only going to furnish to industry and the farmer the cheapest power in the world but we are going to relieve to a certain extent the great pressure put upon gasoline coming from oil. We are going to cheapen transportation not only by rail but by water, through the use of this power. It is not an insignificant question. It is a great question. There seems to be no dispute on that point. I have been trying to deal only with the questions that are in dispute; that is, the excuses offered to vote against reducing the cost of transportation in the country. I have tried to answer that argument. I have no time to dispute with anyone who does not want that done. But the railroad companies will find that the period of meeting mismanagement and bankruptcy through the raising of freight rates has ended, and they will have to meet the problem just as every other industry has had to meet it, by efficiency of operation and management, and by meeting conditions as they are today and not as they were 50 years ago.

I had intended to discuss certain legal objections that have been raised to the treaty. I prefer to discuss those at a later time. I did not bring with me this morning the notes I have prepared on the legal questions that have been raised. I am still ready to argue the legal questions I have stated with regard to sovereignty and with regard to the advisability of our Government treating with other sovereigns. I have already shown from reading the treaty that the United States is not at a disadvantage with Canada in the matter of diversion of water from the watersheds, but both are prohibited from diverting from the watersheds except through the drainage canal at Chicago by us, and that is limited.

I wish it were within my power to have Senators read the briefs and documents that are official on this subject—to give them more careful study. If they did not convince Senators; if they are then willing, on account of some local selfish interest, to vote against a great project like this that is going to reduce the cost of transportation to 52 percent of the farmers of the country and 35 percent of the industries of the country, then to present a national question like this is a hopeless task.

EXHIBIT A

1. Question. Does the St. Lawrence Treaty "surrender sovereignty" over Lake Michigan in any degree?

Answer. The Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty, signed July 18, 1932, does not surrender in any sense the sovereignty of the United States over Lake Michigan. The net result of the pertinent article of the treaty (art. 8) is to establish for a diversion of water from Lake Michigan at Chicago restrictions similar in effect to those provided for in the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909, in the case of future diversion from Lake Michigan.

2. Question. Under international law and practice between civilized neighbors has our "sovereignty" in Lake Michigan ever included—or does it now include—an unlimited right of diversion from Lake Michigan in the event of Canadian protest that the diversion involves a trespass upon Canadian rights in boundary and connecting waters?

Answer. Sovereignty does not, and should not, include the right to use a nation's property in such a manner as to constitute a trespass in a neighboring country upon vested rights of that country.

3. Question. Under all of our general arbitration treaties with Great Britain, would not such a diversion question have come squarely within our obligation to arbitrate?

Answer. The United States has for generations been a leader in accepting and applying the principle of arbitration for the settlement of international claims and disputes. The practice has been extensively resorted to, particularly in the case of Great Britain and Canada, and I cannot conceive of an abandonment of it. There exists between the United States and Great Britain a conciliation treaty, proclaimed November 11, 1914, applicable to matters connected with Canada containing the language that the nations "agree that all disputes between them of every nature whatsoever, other than disputes the settlement of which is provided for, and in fact achieved, under existing agreements between the high contracting parties, shall, when diplomatic methods of adjustment have failed, be referred for investigation and report to a permanent international commission * * *." As the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909 neither attempted nor achieved the settlement as between the Governments of questions such as those which arise from diversions from Lake Michigan, the general practices and obligations of the United States in regard to arbitration or conciliation would no doubt be followed without departure.

4. Question. As a matter of fact, does not this pending treaty represent Canada's first and only official concession to an "American sovereignty" over any diversion from Lake Michigan at Chicago for any purposes?

Answer. As you are doubtless aware, a number of cities in the United States and Canada use water from the Great Lakes for domestic purposes. Ultimately, however, the water taken out of the Lakes is returned to the Great Lakes watershed in every case, I believe, except at Chicago, where the water is diverted to another watershed through the drainage canal. In the pending treaty Canada formally acquiesces for the first time in a diversion of water from Lake Michigan and the Great Lakes watershed to the Mississippi River.

Mr. ERICKSON. Mr. President, I am well aware that I shall be unable to submit any new arguments for the ratification of the St. Lawrence Shipway Treaty, and my only excuse for taking up the time of the Senate is to impress as best I can the profound interest the people of my section and State feel in the treaty, and their earnest desire to secure its ratification and to see this great shipway completed.

For more than a decade the subject of this shipway has been a live issue in both the United States and Canada. In 1924 Calvin Coolidge, then President of the United States, appointed a commission to act jointly with a similar commission from the Canadian Government, to study the feasibility of developing a shipway from the Great Lakes to the Atlantic seaboard. The commission was composed of the ablest and most distinguished engineers and economists of the two Nations. Herbert Hoover, himself an engineer of international fame and reputation, then Secretary of Commerce, and later President of the United States, was chairman of the commission, and after a most exhaustive and careful survey and examination of several proposed routes, unanimously reported and recommended the St. Lawrence way as being the most practical and desirable.

In its report the commission said:

> The shipway should be constructed on the St. Lawrence route provided suitable agreement can be made for its joint undertaking with the Dominion of Canada.

The report of the commission and the proposed construction of the St. Lawrence shipway became tremendously popular in the Northwest and Central States. Twenty-three of the States bordering upon and tributary to the Great Lakes, with a combined population of 40,000,000 people, nearly one third of the entire population of our country, went on record through declarations and resolutions of legislative assemblies, chambers of commerce, and conferences of representatives of these States, in favor of the St. Lawrence shipway.

Support of the shipway is by no means confined to the area to which I have adverted. The American Farm Bureau Federation, a Nation-wide farm organization, at its fifteenth annual convention held in Chicago, in December last, passed the following resolution:

> The St. Lawrence waterway should be completed with the least possible delay to make it possible for work to start on the international section in the near future; the treaty with Canada as it is now pending before the Senate of the United States should be ratified early in the 1934 session of Congress.

From New England comes a message of approval from Henry I. Harriman, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and a national figure in business circles. From a statement which he submitted to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee I quote the following paragraph:

> I am convinced that the St. Lawrence seaway is of the greatest possible importance to the entire north Atlantic seaboard as well as the Middle States, and that New England should unitedly and heartily support the project, because it means:
> First. Lower transportation costs on food supplies, hence the lower cost of living;
> Second. Lower freight rates on many of the raw materials required by New England industries; and > Third. Lower freight rates to many markets for New England finished products.

The people of the Middle West and the Northwest see in this project a gleam of hope to escape from the tremendous handicap they are laboring under, from the unbearable freight rates over the enormous distances to the markets, and the inadequate transportation facilities. By reason of the exorbitant freight rates resulting from the great distances from the industrial centers and from the markets of the world, the farmers and the producers of this otherwise most-favored section of our country are unable to compete with foreign producers in the world markets and with other areas of our country more favorably located. To illustrate, it is in excess of 1,000 miles from the fine wheat-producing sections of Montana to Minneapolis or Duluth, our primary markets. Prior to 1918 the transportation cost per bushel to these markets was approximately 15 cents. At the present time the transportation cost per bushel is little more than 25 cents per bushel. This is an increase of slightly more than 10 cents per bushel, or 70 percent.

If you reduce either one of these transportation factors, you likewise and by the same amount increase the price to the Montana producer.

The constantly increasing freight rates, as is shown by the foregoing illustration, clearly indicate that something must be done if wheat is to be raised in the State of Montana. The same thing is true with reference to practically every other commodity if produced or utilized in the State of Montana and other States in this area.

What has been the result? Progress and development in this part of our country have been halted and the wealth and resources of agriculture, mining, timber, and power lie fallow, because of inaccessibility to the industrial centers and markets of the East.

Someone has well said that there are but two basic problems in civilization: One is production, and the other is proper and adequate means of distribution. We have made remarkable progress in the production of wealth. We have gone a long way in solving problems of production, but we have not been so fortunate in providing for the proper distribution of the wealth we create. Elevators, granaries, and storehouses are overflowing with food and clothing, yet millions of Americans are starving and are illy clad. The farmers and the industrialists have produced beyond the ability of consumers to buy; and so, in these unhappy years of surpluses on the one hand and unemployment on the other suffering and distress have been the result. Our facilities and means of proper distribution have fallen down.

But in what way is the construction of the St. Lawrence shipway going to help us? We do not, of course, claim that the ratification of this treaty will cure all of our economic ills; but we do claim that it would prove a tremendous impetus to the prosperity and growth of these land-locked States of the midcontinent area. It would mean that the farmers of this large agricultural region could load their wheat on ships at Duluth and ship it to the foreign markets direct without breaking cargo. I think it was pretty conclusively proven at the hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee by rate experts that this would mean a very definite and material reduction in freight rates on commodities destined for the eastern and European markets. In fact, the opponents of the treaty admitted at the hearing a saving of at least 6 cents per bushel on wheat from points on the Great Lakes to Liverpool. Other experts placed the saving in freight at from 8 to 10 cents per bushel.

For the sake of argument, let us assume that the saving on wheat would be 6 cents per bushel. What would that mean to the farmer of this great wheat area? Montana, notwithstanding its unfavorable climatic conditions for the past 6 years, has raised on an average of 60,000,000 bushels of wheat annually. At least 50,000,000 were destined for export. What would this mean to the farmers of that State? It would mean approximately $3,000,000 per year. The 23 States to which I have referred raise on an average approximately 700,000,000 bushels annually. Evidently a saving of only 6 cents per bushel would be worth while for the American wheat raiser.

I heard the late lamented Senator Thomas J. Walsh, speaking to his people in Montana a short time before his death, say, "The testimony before the Senate committee is that the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence shipway would reduce the cost of transporting wheat from Duluth to Liverpool or Hamburg by from 8 to 10 cents per bushel. "That", he declared, "would be a greater measure of farm relief to the people of the Northwest than anything that has yet been proposed. It would reduce the freight rate 8 to 10 cents a bushel; and what," he asked, "does that mean?" Answering his own question he said, "Inasmuch as the local price is regulated and controlled by the foreign price, it would elevate the price of all those products to the same level."

These were not idle words. They were the words of a profound student of economics and a talented and brilliant statesman who mastered every subject to which he applied himself. His untimely passing was a very definite loss to his State and to the Nation, and we all deeply regret that he could not have been spared long enough to complete the intensive fight he commenced and carried on for this great international highway of commerce which was so near to his heart and which means so much to this country. What he said about wheat would also apply to other surplus commodities in the States of the Midwest and the Northwest, such as dairy products and heavy freights transported across the country and to foreign markets.

But it is not only on outgoing freight that we shall save on freight rates. We shall also profit tremendously on incoming cargoes. There are commodities, such as print paper, rubber, coffee, and so forth, that we must import. In the issue of Sunday, September 25, 1932, the Chicago Tribune, one of the greatest newspapers in the country, had an editorial, from which I quote as follows:

If the St. Lawrence shipway is built, it is altogether probable that it would permit economies in the manufacture of and transport of paper, which might amount to as much as $3 per ton on the 100,000 tons which the Tribune manufactures and consumes every year. The building of the St. Lawrence waterway would mean an annual increase in the net profits of this newspaper of $300,000. Similar advantages, in greater or less degree, might be expected to flow to other newspapers receiving their paper supplies by way of the Lakes from lower St. Lawrence. Chicago will be the southwestern terminus of the seaway. If any of the Lake cities should benefit from the ratification of the treaty, Chicago is certain to be among the principal gainers.

Here is the testimony of a great newspaper in a great city to the effect that $300,000 a year would be saved by the building of this shipway upon a single commodity used in this one institution. When we contemplate the enormous amount of newsprint used by other papers, not in Chicago alone but in all the cities on the Lakes and in the tributary territory, the aggregate amount saved in freight on this one commodity alone would be staggering. With such testimony before us it is difficult indeed to visualize the extent of the benefit that would accrue to the cities on the Great Lakes and to the interior States tributary to the Lakes; and yet, strange to say, we are told that this treaty must not be ratified, that the shipway must not be built.

The building of the Panama Canal changed the currents of commerce and was a tremendous advantage to the seaport cities and States on the seacoasts from Seattle on the west all the way around to New York and Boston on the east. Coast cities have prospered marvelously since the construction of the big Canal; but it is also true that the interior of our country was thereby more effectively landlocked. It has been asserted many times that the Panama Canal is one waterway which, to some extent, at least, injured the business of the railroads, especially the transcontinental lines of the West. Heavy freights, such as wheat and lumber, which were carried by rail across the continent are now diverted by way of the Panama Canal, while heavy machinery and bulky freights from the factories of the East go west by way of the Canal. Understand, we are not complaining about this. The people directly benefited by the Panama Canal are our neighbors, are a part of our common country, and we glory in their good fortune and prosperity. We all recognize that the Canal is a tremendous asset to our country as a whole, and its construction was a marvelous achievement in which we all have a just pride. But now there is an opportunity to bring to the heart of the continent the seaports of the Atlantic, and bring to the people of the West an opportunity to enjoy the commercial and economic advantages that the coast cities are enjoying. Do not the facts and the conditions justify the demand that this region be given the commercial and industrial advantages enjoyed by our more fortunate neighbors on the seacoasts?

Twenty-three States referred to are appealing for this shipway. Here are resources and potential wealth beyond the dreams of avarice still undeveloped. We have minerals, timber, coal, iron, and power the potential value of which is inestimable; and some day our neighbors to the east will need these raw materials. What will it mean to these people and to these States to have seaports brought to their very doors? It will mean the building of cities and industrial centers on the harbors of the Great Lakes. It will mean that industry will move westward to the great reservoirs of raw materials. It will bring about employment for labor and convenient markets for the products of the farm; for copper, timber, iron, and power, which are so abundant in this area; and, above all, we shall have an outlet to the sea for our surpluses and have a convenient access to the markets of the world.

This is a Nation of surpluses. We are at the present time seeking to prevent surpluses by forced limitation on production. This, it seems to me, is economically unsound and indefensible, except possibly in times of great emergency, such as we are now experiencing. Prosperity cannot be achieved by destroying wealth. Rather, let there be an orderly and businesslike development of our wealth, and let our surpluses be cared for by expanding markets. I hope, in the ordinary course of events, as we emerge from the depression, that tariff schedules will be revamped, reciprocal trade agreements negotiated with neighboring nations, that our currency base will be adjusted and widened so that we may be placed in position to trade and carry on commerce with our neighbors in other lands. Important, however, as measures such as these are to our recovery, we shall not fully regain our foreign trade unless transportation facilities to foreign markets are improved and freight rates drastically reduced. With the approach of normal times the need of this seaway becomes more and more apparent. We need ocean-going vessels to penetrate the heart of our continent and carry away surpluses to world markets.

If the farmers are to compete successfully with the producers of other nations, they sorely need the saving of 8 cents per bushel in freight on their wheat.

I have been urged by some of my railroad friends to oppose and vote against this treaty, under the plea that the waterways are against the interests of the railroads and that waterways will serve no useful purpose to the public. I do not want to be understood as baiting the railroads. In these unhappy times they have their problems, and this is no time further to embarrass them or to increase their burdens; but it is doubtful indeed, in my judgment, that water transportation will ever become a menace to the railroads of our country as a whole. If the development of waterways will stimulate business and aid in the prosperity and advancement of the country, then railroads, together with other industries, will certainly be benefited. Anything that will be helpful to the people and make the country more prosperous will also help and make prosperous the railroads. If in some instances they lose tonnage, they will gain in others.

In this connection it is interesting to recall the views of the late James J. Hill, perhaps the most successful builder and railroad executive of his generation. He was, as many Senators know, a dynamic character, a man of vision and action. He not only built and operated railroads successfully, but he was a powerful influence in the development of the Northwest, through which he built his railroads. He earned the sobriquet of "Empire Builder", and this title was worthily bestowed upon him. In a book entitled "Highways of Progress", which he wrote and published a short time before his death, he devotes a chapter to waterways. He declares that erroneous ideas existed in the mind of the public as to the relations existing between land and water transportation, and that the most prevalent error was the idea that railroads and waterways are antagonistic, and that either could do business only at the expense of the other.

But—

there is nowhere any evidence of any unfriendly disposition on the part of the railroads toward water transportation. Each is fitted for a peculiar office in transportation. In any well organized national system they will supplement each other.

He then sets out a clearly thought-out program for the development of our waterways. He suggests that the first project should be the improvement of the Mississippi from the Gulf to St. Louis, and from there deep water connections with the Great Lakes. For east and west business, he points to the Great Lakes, but he says they—must be supplemented by a deep waterway along the Erie Canal to the Atlantic ports. These two main water highways—stretching toward the four points of the compass, should for the time command all the energy and all the resources we have to give to waterway improvements. Subsidiary projects should take place later according to their relative importance, unless there is enough local interest and financial support to push them without calling on Federal aid.

We can readily see that he was not only a successful railroad executive but a statesman and prophet as well. It is not difficult to determine what the attitude of this sturdy pioneer and builder would be if he were alive today. He would be for this treaty, and he would be for the Great Lakes and Gulf waterway. He would see in these two great enterprises the fruition of the prophetic vision of his younger days. I cannot refrain from including in my remarks the final paragraph of Mr. Hill's chapter on waterways. It is an earnest appeal to his countrymen to support his program for developing the Nation's waterways. He says:

To favor and to labor for such a system, even though it should demand local self-sacrifice and the postponement of local desire, is the duty of all of us as good citizens and honest business men. Railroad and waterway, needing each other and both needed by the people, may work together for the good of the people. The transportation problem, which grows and complicates with our growth and with every artificial restriction imposed upon it, may be solved by intelligent anticipation. A deep-waterway movement that shall set for itself this standard will command the support of the people by commending itself to their judgment instead of their greed. It will get rid of local log rolling and all the brood of those who are "for the old flag and an appropriation." It will complete and make adequate to future needs the whole system of transportation by land and water in the United States. It will place those who succeed in popularizing and establishing it among the most far-sighted statesmen of their time.

I cannot conceive, Mr. President, how an enterprise that will directly promote the welfare of 40,000,000 people, and will stimulate the development of the resources of 23 States, can be a menace to the railroads. It is a trite thing to say, but tremendously true, that the prosperity of the railroads depends wholly upon the prosperity of the people. The St. Lawrence shipway should not be regarded as antagonistic but rather as supplementary to the railways in serving the people. The great commercial and industrial cities of the world are found where the highways of the land and the waterways meet. The railroads in the territory directly affected by the St. Lawrence shipway will be benefited rather than injured by the completion of the shipway. They will continue to transport cattle, sheep, and hogs to the great packing centers of St. Paul, Omaha, Kansas City, St. Louis, and Chicago, just as they are now doing. They will continue to gather from the hinterland the grain and the wool, the copper and the timber, and all surplus products of the farms and industries, and haul them to the ocean ports on the Great Lakes, just as they are now doing, and the business and tonnage will increase with the growth and development of the country. The waterways can never supplant the railroads. The railroads must of necessity continue to be an indispensable factor in our transportation system. Waterways may and will supplement the railroads and improve the service to the people, but they can never take the place of the railroads.

Complaint is made that the construction of this seaway will increase the tax load on railroads, which, indeed, is already too burdensome. In this connection it should be borne in mind that the cost of construction of the shipway will not come out of State taxes nor from taxes on property, but entirely from Federal funds. Any increase of Federal taxes required from railroads by reason of the construction of this project would be negligible.

It is a well-known fact that the construction of the Panama Canal was of very definite advantage to the eastern roads, and likewise of disadvantage to the roads of the Great Lake States and tributary areas, because it changed the current of commerce from the Central and Northwestern States. The completion of the St. Lawrence shipway will do for the States of the interior portions of the country what the Panama Canal did for the Pacific, the Gulf, and Atlantic seaports and the railroads along these coasts. Likewise the railroads of the Great Lakes area will benefit by the construction of the St. Lawrence shipway in the same way that the railroads of the East and seacoast region were benefited by the construction of the Panama Canal. The balance between the eastern and western roads which was obviously disturbed by the construction of the Panama Canal, will be restored by the completion of the St. Lawrence shipway.

I want to come back for a moment, Mr. President, to that very worthwhile project, the Great Lakes and Gulf waterway. I do not understand why there should be any conflict between that project and the St. Lawrence shipway, nor why the advocates of either should oppose the other.

The proponents of the Gulf way complain that under this treaty a sufficient diversion of water from Lake Michigan is not permitted. The treaty, it will be recalled, permits a diversion of 1,500 cubic feet per second from Lake Michigan for the Gulf way and, in addition, pumping privileges of 1,700 cubic feet per second, making a total diversion of 3,200 cubic feet per second available for the project. Is not this sufficient for a commercial waterway to the Gulf?

The testimony of one of the ablest and most distinguished engineers of the country, given at the hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee in December 1932, was that of Dr. S. R. MacElwee, of New York and Massachusetts, a specialist in ports and terminal facilities, canals, and dry docks. Speaking on this very question, he said:

The Monongahela River, with 25,000,000 tons traffic a year, uses 200 cubic feet per second of time of water. The Ohio River, with 20,000,000 tons of traffic, uses 1,100 second-feet. The Panama Canal, with 28,000,000 tons of traffic, uses 1,300 second-feet; and the Illinois River, with 10,000,000 tons, has 3,200 second-feet.

Dr. MacElwee's testimony was corroborated by an imposing array of high-class engineers at that hearing. It is upon testimony such as this that the most vital and important matters and controversies are settled and decided. It is upon testimony of this kind that courts base their decrees and judgments.

This testimony shows that the Great Lakes and Gulf way will carry less than one half as much freight as the Monongahela River, yet will have 16 times as much water. It will carry only one half as much freight as the Ohio River, and yet will have three times as much water. It will carry a little more than one third as much freight as the Panama Canal, yet will have more than twice as much water. If navigation is the only purpose of this waterway, one wonders, indeed, why there should be such an insistent demand for a greater amount of diversion from Lake Michigan.

There is nowhere, to my knowledge, any hostility to the Great Lakes and Gulf waterway. The people of the Northwest are enthusiastically in favor of it. It is a part of the great program of the development of our waterways visioned by the late James J. Hill and advocated by the present Chief Executive. Herbert Hoover, while President, some 3 years ago, in a notable speech at Louisville, Ky., where he gave to the country his program for the improvement of the Mississippi River and its tributaries so as to give to the people of the interior of our Nation a waterway to the Gulf, also included in his program the St. Lawrence shipway, in these words:

One of the most vital improvements to transportation in the North American Continent is the removal of the obstacles in the St. Lawrence River to ocean-going vessels inbound to the Great Lakes. Our Nation should undertake to do its part whenever our Canadian friends overcome those difficulties which lie in the path of our making similar undertakings.

Surely between these two great waterways there should be no war. Ultimately they will serve a common purpose and will in a very definite way promote the welfare and prosperity of our people.

We are told that it is unjust and unfair to tax one portion of our Nation for the benefit of another. This is indeed a strange doctrine to preach in a Nation such as ours. We have been taught that the welfare and prosperity of one section of our country is reflected in the whole, and an injury to a part is an injury to all. We are one Nation, but many members.

And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it.

Let us not forget that for more than a century the whole people have been taxed for the improvement of rivers and harbors. Up to June 30, 1932, the records show that approximately $1,900,000,000 of Federal funds, the money of the taxpayers, had been spent for flood control and the improvement of rivers and harbors. The Government has been more than generous in its contributions to these coastwise projects, and has been most prodigal with the taxpayers' money for the improvement of rivers and harbors. We find from the record that New York has received for the improvement of its harbor approximately seventy million tax-dollars; New Orleans has received approximately fifty-one million tax-dollars; and the Philadelphia district approximately sixty-seven million tax-dollars, while four hundred million was spent for the construction of the Panama Canal, and some seven hundred million on the Mississippi River for navigation and flood control. For the expenditure of these vast sums of money we have no complaints and no regrets, notwithstanding the fact that the benefits from these huge expenditures were infinitely greater to the coastwise communities than the benefits accruing to the interior portions of our country. Now that there is an opportunity to extend the seacoast to the heart of the continent, and extend to these land-locked States of the West and Northwest the same commercial and economic advantages enjoyed by the seacoast cities and communities, we have a right to expect the same generous support and cooperation; but, instead, we are confronted with the ungenerous attitude that "We have got ours, and we are not interested in your welfare."

To say the least, this is unsportsmanlike. Much of the opposition to the construction of this seaway, as I understand, is inspired by fear that business and commerce will be diverted from the Atlantic ports. Much of this fear also appears to be provincial and sectional in its nature. Surely the facts and circumstances do not justify such fears. I think, Mr. President, that it is pretty generally conceded that the completion of the St. Lawrence shipway would be a powerful stimulant to the development of the wealth and resources of the States bordering on and tributary to the Great Lakes, and hence would in a very definite way enhance the prosperity and well-being of the people living in that area; and I am sure no one will seriously contend that the welfare of Chicago and New York would thereby be menaced. As a matter of fact, our eastern friends have everything to gain and nothing to lose from the development and prosperity of the West.

The States of the Northwest, one of which I have the honor to represent in part, are confronted with difficulties incident to the opening up of frontiers; and in meeting these difficulties and problems we owe much to the East. The East has furnished much of the capital necessary to subdue the frontier and lay the foundation of a civilization; but the other side of the ledger is also worth considering. The industries of the East there find a most valuable market for the products of their mills and factories. From our neighbors to the east we buy our automobiles, farm implements, and machinery used in our mines and our industries. From eastern mills and factories we buy our clothing, furniture, and household equipment. Hundreds of thousands of dollars are annually sent to eastern financial centers as interest on bonds and mortgages and as premiums on life- and fire-insurance policies. In fact, there is a constant flow of wealth from the West to the treasuries of the East, and this stream will continue to increase as the resources are developed.

A contemplation of the future of this region to which I have adverted, and which is directly interested in the ratification of this treaty, is interesting and fascinating. With its thousands of square miles of soil, equaling in fertility, if it does not excel, the famous valley of the Nile; with its potential wealth in mines and forests, in coal and iron, in oil and power, who can foretell its future? In asking for the completion of the St. Lawrence shipway the 40,000,000 people who inhabit the area to which I have just referred are not asking for special favors; but they ask the same commercial and economic advantages which have heretofore been so generously extended, at the cost of the taxpayers of the Nation, to the seaport cities from Seattle all the way around to New York and Boston. In all fairness and justice they are entitled to this. They are inherently entitled to the cheapest and most convenient transportation facilities available. This is indeed necessary if they are to be placed in a position to compete successfully in the markets of the world and to contribute their share of the Nation's prosperity and well-being.

The opponents of the treaty tell us that the Canadians will be the principal, if not the sole, beneficiaries of this seaway. The question is not so much how it will affect our neighbors to the north, but, rather, will it help our own people? This is an international undertaking. Each of the two Nations is contributing its share of the cost of construction, and it goes without saying that they will share in the resulting benefits. I think I am justified in saying that it is the hope and the wish of all Americans that our northern neighbors will enjoy substantial benefits from this enterprise.

The assertion, however, that Canada will enjoy the maximum and the United States the minimum benefits has no foundation in fact. The International Joint Commission, after an exhaustive and critical survey and investigation of this question, in its official report states this as one of its findings:

> That as between the American and Canadian sides of the tributary area the former contributes very much the larger share of foreign and coastwise trade, and in all probability will continue to do so for many years to come. The benefits to be derived from the opening of a water route to the sea will therefore accrue in a much larger measure to American than Canadian interests, although it is reasonable to assume that eventually the advantages may be more evenly distributed.

This commission, as is well known, was composed of an equal number of representatives from the United States and Canada, and I know of no more competent or reliable authority to cite. No one can study the evidence and the facts adduced in the hearing before the Foreign Relations Committee without being tremendously impressed with the fact that the opening of the St. Lawrence River to ocean-going ships will be mutually beneficial to both countries; and the evidence is most persuasive that the interests of the United States will be tremendously benefited, and this fact is an ample justification for the ratification of the treaty.

Mr. President, much has been said about the cost of this enterprise. Opponents of the treaty have indulged in all sorts of fantastic estimates of the amount necessary to complete this shipway. However, we have the estimates made as to the cost of construction by the joint board of engineers, after a most careful and complete survey and examination. The report of the joint board, filed April 9, 1932, places the sum total necessary to complete the waterway at $543,429,000. Of this amount $272,453,000 has been allocated to the United States, and $270,976,000 is to be expended by the Dominion of Canada. A considerable portion of these funds has already been paid by both countries. Analyzing the portion to be expended, the joint board of engineers find that $56,500,000 will be required for deepening the channels in the upper lakes, providing a new lock in the St. Marys River, and constructing the compensation works, which the United States has agreed to build. Of this sum $14,000,000 has already been appropriated and allotted and $42,500,000 is yet to be spent.

The cost to the United States in deepening the river in the Thousand Islands section will be $461,000 and this has also been appropriated. The expenditure in the International Rapids section chargeable to the United States is placed at $215,492,000; thus making a total of $257,992,000 of new funds which the United States is to expend for both navigation and power. From this sum is to be deducted $89,000,000, which the Power Authority of the State of New York has agreed to pay the United States for the power to be developed on the American side. This leaves a net balance of $169,000,000 to be paid by this Government to complete the waterway. Let it be remembered that the amounts already appropriated and allotted were made in contemplation of a completed waterway.

The amount to be expended by the Canadian Government, to wit, $270,967,000, has been apportioned by the Joint Board of Engineers as follows: $128,000,000 for the Welland Canal, which has been completed; $772,000 for the works in the Thousand Islands section; $59,250,000 in the international section; and $82,954,000 for improvement in the Lake Francis, Soulanges, and Lachine areas, which are wholly in Canadian territory. The Joint Board of Engineers making the estimate was composed of six eminent engineers selected by each of the two Governments. Certainly no higher or better authority on the question of the cost of the proposed waterway can be had. The report filed by this Commission is competent and persuasive testimony of the cost and construction and completion of the waterway.

Mr. President, I have very briefly and imperfectly called attention to some of the advantages and necessities of this great shipway. Its completion is essential to the well-being of the great majority of the people of our country. Those who oppose the ratification of the treaty are comparatively few in number, but they are powerful in influence. As I stated a moment ago, the opposition comes very largely from the great financial centers of the East, from the cities and States along the seacoasts which are smugly enjoying the economic and commercial advantages which now they would deny to their fellow citizens of the interior.

But the masses of American people from New England to the Rockies are for the treaty. The 40,000,000 people who live in the States bordering the Great Lakes and tributary to them are pleading for release from the economic bondage which has and is retarding the development of their resources and impairing their prosperity and welfare. The people of the West and Northwest, who have made a heroic struggle to eliminate the frontiers and to subdue the semi-arid plains of the great open spaces and who are now building thereon homes—homes, sir, that are nurseries of industry, frugality, and patriotism—these are all earnestly pleading for the ratification of this treaty.

Four former Presidents have approved this project. Our great President has again and again declared himself for the shipway and has for many years been its ardent advocate, and recently sent a ringing message to the Congress urging ratification of the treaty.

Much of the work in the seaway has already been done. We already have an investment of some fifteen or sixteen million dollars, which, unless the seaway is completed, will be lost.

Let us ratify the treaty, complete the job, and bring the sea to the prairies of the West.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, before the Senator resumes his seat, may I ask him to yield to me in order that I may obtain some information?

Mr. ERICKSON. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. I recognize the Senator from Montana as an authority upon the question of freight rates, particularly those affecting grain from the Northwest. The Senator has not only been elected term after term Governor of the great State of Montana but his associations personally are such that I am pleased to hear his view. I did not quite catch some of the figures he cited; for instance, some which, according to his judgment, showed what would be saved in freight rates on, say, grain from Montana to the market. I should like to ask the Senator if he means the market through the ocean to Liverpool?

Mr. ERICKSON. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. Or the market merely to American ports?

Mr. ERICKSON. To eastern American ports also. I apprehend that the freight rates from local points in Montana to the Twin Cities, St. Paul and Minneapolis, probably would not be affected very much, but from there on they would be affected.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator assumes that the grain would be sent by rail so far, say, as Minneapolis and St. Paul?

Mr. ERICKSON. It would have to be.

Mr. LEWIS. And from St. Paul and Minneapolis how would it reach water, would the Senator say?

Mr. ERICKSON. If this proposed shipway should be completed, of course, for European markets, they would load right at the harbors there and send direct through to the foreign market without breaking cargo.

Mr. LEWIS. What harbor does the Senator have in his mind would be the harbor at which the grain could be loaded which was shipped to St. Paul and Minneapolis?

Mr. ERICKSON. Probably Duluth; I should have said Duluth.

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. I thank the Senator. The Senator assumes that from Duluth would start the voyage by water through the Great Lakes on to Europe?

Mr. ERICKSON. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. And he assumes from that, by such a route there would be a cheapening of freight rates compared to those now charged as the cargoes are ordinarily carried?

Mr. ERICKSON. That is the testimony I gather from the investigaton made by the committee.

Mr. LEWIS. I appreciate the Senator's reply and now understand his position.

REPORT OF NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

As in legislative session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the act of March 3, 1915, which established the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I submit herewith the nineteenth annual report of that committee for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933.

The attention of the Congress is invited to the opening pages of the committee's report giving the major reasons for the recent improvements in the speed and efficiency of airplanes for military and civil uses. The principal underlying cause of this remarkable progress has been the efficient functioning of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics in coordinating and planning for the research needs of aviation, civil and military, and in conducting the necessary fundamental scientific researches to serve the needs of all agencies.

I concur in the committees' opinion that the continuous prosecution of fundamental research in aeronautics is essential to the national defense and to the future of air transportation upon a sound economic basis.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1934.

(NOTE—Report accompanied similar message to the House of Representatives.)

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I do not expect to speak this afternoon.

Mr. LEWIS. I inquire if the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] expects to take the floor this afternoon?

Mr. FESS. I do not.

PAYMENT OF DEBTS BY FINLAND AND ITALY

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein a short resolution of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce commending the Finland Government on its attitude toward payment of its national debt.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include a resolution adopted recently by the Chamber of Commerce of Los Angeles, Calif., commending the Finland and Italian Governments in their attitude toward payment of their respective national debts to the United States Government.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas, upon the urgent appeal of responsible and accredited representatives of various foreign governments, and under terms and arrangements fully agreed to by all concerned, the Government of the United States made certain loans to the said foreign governments; and

Whereas, in a spirit of good will, and prompted by a desire to extend every aid and consideration to the debtor nations, the Government of the United States later agreed to a modification of the terms of repayment of the said loans amounting to a remission of a very large portion of the debts; and

Whereas the sanctity of international agreements and the prompt discharge of international obligations are essential to the well-being of all the peoples of the world; and

Whereas of the whole number of debtor nations the Government of Finland is the sole Government thus far making its debt payments in full and when due; and

Whereas the Government of Italy, while feeling itself unable to meet its payments in full, has shown evidence, through the payment of a material part of its obligation, of a sincere desire to discharge its debt to the United States on a basis of capacity to pay: Now, therefore, be it hereby

Resolved, That the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce does herewith warmly commend the Government and the people of Finland, and the Government and people of Italy, for the faithful and honorable manner in which their respective international agreements have been kept in this instance.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO SIT DURING SESSIONS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures may be permitted to sit in hearings on Tuesday afternoon in order that they may hear Father Coughlan on the monetary system; and, incidentally, I invite the attention of the Members to this hearing and hope they will cooperate with the committee by offering the chairman the names of any other witnesses who may be able to add anything of interest in this investigation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the members of the Committee on Agriculture may have until midnight tonight to file a majority report and minority views on the bill H.R. 6670.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does that bill involve the question of the guaranty of farm-loan bonds?

Mr. JONES. It does.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, there is now on the calendar a bill extending the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

It is a very short bill and one that will have to be passed before January 21, because the corporation expires at that time by limitation of law.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, will report during the day a bill relating to farm loans.

These bills, of course, ought to be disposed of promptly, and I ask unanimous consent, giving notice now, so that Members may have an opportunity to look into these bills between now and the date named, that both of these bills be given a privileged status, to be called up by the chairmen of the respective committees, and to be considered under the general rules of the House.

I may say to the House, frankly, that if this consent is granted, it is hoped that both of these gentlemen will call up these bills on Monday and ask for their consideration. These bills will be followed, according to present knowledge, by the Interior Department appropriation bill.

If consideration of the pending bill is completed today, I do not know of any disposition upon the part of anyone which would prevent an adjournment over, after concluding the consideration of the bill, until Monday; but I do hope the House will grant this request. Of course, a rule can be obtained, but that is a pure formality and is not necessary, because we have now 2 or 3 days in which to acquaint ourselves with the provisions of these two bills, with the knowledge that they will be called up on Monday.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. So far as I know, there will be no objection to the unanimous-consent request, but at the present time I do not see the ranking minority member of either of the committees on the floor, and I have not had any opportunity to consult with them. I wish the gentleman would make the request later in the afternoon, and I may say to the gentleman now that, so far as I am personally concerned, if it is agreeable to those gentlemen, I shall not object.

Mr. BYRNS. Then I withhold the request, under that statement, but will renew it later in the afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. That will be all right.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman has indicated that he intends to bring in legislation that would extend the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but he did not indicate how long the life of that corporation is to be extended.

Mr. BYRNS. I have not seen the report of the committee, but it is my understanding the report contemplates an extension of 1 year.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will yield further, is this the same invidious Reconstruction Finance Corporation that has been so severely criticized by the gentleman himself and other leaders on that side during the past 2 years, or is it a reconstructed Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. BYRNS. I will say to the gentleman, in the first place, I do not know of any severe criticism I have made of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The most severe criticism I ever heard of the R.F.C. was because of a large loan made to the bank of a fellow citizen of the gentleman in the city of Chicago.

Mr. BLANTON. Nearly $100,000,000 to Mr. Republican Vice President Dawes' bank, most of which was a loss to the people of this Government.

Mr. BYRNS. And let me say further, in reply to the gentleman, that this is not the same Reconstruction Finance Corporation, because it has been entirely reorganized, and any criticism that has been leveled against the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the past from this side of the House was caused by the tremendous loan of $90,000,000 to the bank of a fellow citizen of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Can the gentleman inform the House how much of that loan has been repaid in the past 12 months?

Mr. BYRNS. I have seen some statements in the papers, but I have no direct information on the subject.

Mr. BRITTEN. I will give the gentleman the information. Thirty three and a third percent of that loan has been repaid, and all of it will ultimately be repaid.

Mr. BYRNS. I am very happy to hear that.

Mr. BRITTEN. And I may say to the gentleman, if he will permit, if there were one idealistic form of commission or administration created by Hoover that was criticized day after day and week after week and month after month on that side of the aisle, it was the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and now you are proposing to adopt it, hook, bait, and sinker, and love it.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me say to the gentleman that in referring to the $90,000,000 loan which was made under the Hoover administration to a bank of a former Vice President, who had been a member of that Corporation, the gentleman stated that one third of the loan has been repaid and that the balance would be paid. I take it that the gentleman knows what he is talking about. Is the gentleman willing to underwrite the payment of the remaining $60,000,000? [Laughter and applause.] The gentleman says it is going to be paid.

Mr. BRITTEN. I want to thank my good friend for that compliment. I will gladly underwrite that payment for a one half of 1 percent commission. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. It will be paid when France pays.

CIVIL WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to include therein comments upon information conveyed to me in certain letters from departments of the University of Idaho.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho? There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters commenting on the Civil Works Administration:

UNIVERSITY OF IDAHO,
Moscow, December 27, 1933.

Mrs. DAISY CRESWELL,
President Emmett Civic Club, Emmett, Idaho.

DEAR MRS. CRESWELL: The Civil Works Administration has allotted certain funds for the hiring of needy artists and craftsmen in the beautification of tax-supported buildings. The work to be done may be mural paintings, easel paintings, statuary, etc. These works are to be done on a weekly contract basis for a period of about 6 weeks, and are to be administered by a State committee under a regional commission. I have been appointed chairman of this committee for the State of Idaho, and I should appreciate your assistance in proposing any works of this sort which may be advisable in any public building in your neighborhood.

Information as to the exact procedure is lacking at this time, as the Civil Works Administration has just announced the project, and we are in the process of forming our committees. It has been proven, however, in the matter of public works that those people who have projects definitely in mind to submit to the committee at an early date are usually the ones who secure first consideration in the matter of public money. I am, therefore, writing for your advice and aid in order that we may form some estimate of the number of people who could be employed in this State and the number of works available.

This recognition of art by the Government would seem to me a splendid move, and one that every cultured man would desire to foster. I can think of no better place for the expenditure of money than in the libraries and public schools, together with town buildings, etc. I shall appreciate any assistance that you may give me, previous to sending out the formal applications, in the matter of recommending works to be done or needy artists in your community.

Yours very truly,

T. J. PRICHARD,
Head of Department of Art and Architecture.

EMMETT, IDAHO, January 4, 1934.

Hon. COMPTON WHITE,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As an old and valued friend of my husband, Frank W. Hunt, I am asking for some information. The enclosed letter has been handed to me to answer.

Now, my position is this: I am rather frightened over high taxes and the extravagance in everything handled here for employment by the Government. Idaho probably hasn't a single needy artist. Few small towns have any buildings that need mural paintings, easel, or any other kind.

Why do we have to spend such sums of money so foolishly? Thinking people of the middle class know they have the bills to pay.

Will you kindly let me hear from you in regard to this? Please return letter enclosed, as I want to have it.

With kind regards, I am, sincerely,

Mrs. RUTH M. HUNT.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of my colleague, Mr. DINGELL, I wish to state that he was unable to be here yesterday, but had he been present he would have voted against House Resolution 217.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

And pending that, I would like to see if we cannot agree on time for further general debate. We have already had nearly 7 hours debate on this bill, including 3 hours on the rule. I hope very much that Members will be now willing to conclude debate at an early time so that we may finish the bill today. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if we can agree upon 2 hours, 1 hour on a side?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I think it is impossible to agree on such short debate. We have a great many requests on this side amounting to two and a half or three hours. I do not see how we can get through with so short general debate. It is true we have had considerable debate, but not much has been devoted to the bill. It has been mainly on the rule. There has been no presentation of the bill. The debate yesterday was on the rule. I think we ought to have a reasonable time for general debate.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to 3 hours, one hour and a half on a side, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and the other half by myself, and debate be confined to the bill.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my friend if he cannot see his way to increase the time? My impression is that there was a general understanding that general debate would be reserved until we concluded the consideration of the rule.

Mr. WOODRUM. As far as I am personally concerned, I am willing to go on 2 or 3 days on the bill, but many Members are anxious to conclude it today. There is going to be considerable discussion under the 5-minute rule, and it seems to me an hour and a half on a side is ample time for liberal debate. Day before yesterday we adjourned at 4 o'clock because no one wanted to talk.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The gentleman knows the bill has not been presented to the House in detail. We have no objection to limiting the debate to the bill, but I think an hour and a half is entirely too short.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move that general debate be limited to 3 hours and that it be confined to the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman cannot make that motion.

Mr. WOODRUM. Why not? We have had some debate on the bill.

Mr. SNELL. We have not had any debate on the bill; it has been on the rule. The gentleman will remember that I called attention to the fact when we gave unanimous consent for debate, that we wanted more time, and the gentleman said that he would take that into consideration. As a matter of fact, this is one of the most important bills before the House, and we have had no debate upon the bill itself.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the motion and prefer this unanimous-consent request, that debate be limited to the bill and to be confined to 3½ hours.

Mr. SNELL. Make it 4 and we will not say anything.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is not the gentleman willing to trade at all? Does he have to have everything his own way?

Mr. SNELL. We wanted 5.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I make the unanimous-consent request that the debate be confined to 3½ hours, one half of that time to be controlled by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] and one half by myself, the debate to be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia modifies his request and asks unanimous consent that the general debate be confined to 3½ hours, to be confined to the bill, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Is there objection?

Mr. BRITTEN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to add to that request of the gentleman that I may be permitted to talk out of order for 5 or 10 minutes if I can get time from this side, in order to say something to the House about the mass Navy flight from San Francisco to Honolulu yesterday.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Illinois, of course, knows perfectly well that as much as we would like to accommodate him, if we should, other gentlemen would be likely to make similar requests.

Mr. BRITTEN. But there is no other request like that pending.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman can present that request in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill, with Mr. BULWINKLE in the chair.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Chairman, during the Great World War, while the soldiers were training in the camps or groping their way through treacherous submarine seas, or crouching in the trenches of France, or facing the cannon in the open fields of battle, certain great international financiers and manipulating bankers, taking advantage of the pressing need of the Government and profiteering in war supplies, amassed great wealth and swollen fortunes. And during which time they had become the boasted creditors of the world, the financial dictators of the earth.

And when the war was over, still following the impulse of greed and gain, these men were not satisfied with their millions made but were even more grasping for money, greater wealth, and riches; greedy to make more money, to make more millions, more billions. These men were shrewd and crafty financiers. They knew the laws and principles of money. They knew the power of money. They knew how to manipulate money to double and triple their gains in money. And in secrecy they conceived and conspired to multiply their fortunes by certain changes and manipulations in money, contracting and withdrawing money from circulation, until under monetary and economic laws, the values of their war-profit holdings were doubled, tripled, and multiplied over again. On May 18, 1920, in Washington, D.C., in the very shadows of the Capitol a secret bankers' meeting was held behind closed doors and drawn curtains. And a secret resolution was passed calling upon the Federal Reserve Board to contract and withdraw from circulation the money and credits of the country.

And in servile obedience to the resolution the Federal Reserve Board acted. The open market operations were made to function, selling bonds and securities upon the market. The discount rate was raised and raised again, until more than one half of the money and credits of the country were contracted and withdrawn from circulation. And under monetary and economic laws, values, the price level, and the wage scale were forced down lower and lower, taking from the people their earnings and income and destroying their buying and consuming power. The same cause—the contraction of money, the secret withdrawal of money from circulation—which deprived the people of their earnings and income and destroyed their buying and consuming power, destroyed their taxpaying power, and left them without earnings or means with which to both pay taxes and live, left them to choose between the obligation to pay taxes and the higher impulses of life.

When Congress was called to convene last March in special session to consider farm and industrial relief, taxes had become a cruel, crushing burden upon the people; an intolerable, harrowing menace before the people. The people were writhing in the throes of a galling strain and crisis, taxpayers were everywhere groaning and staggering under the crushing burdens of taxation. Taxes were everywhere in default and delinquent, taxpayers were calling a halt to the further collection and assessment of taxes and demanding a reduction of public expenses in salaries, wages, and all costs of the Government. The people were rising in determined protest, threatening a strike against taxes and all but resisting and defying the taxing power of the government of the several States and the Nation as well. State legislatures were being convened to consider and provide for tax relief under the imperative demands from the people to reduce salaries and cut down wages and all public costs and expenses.

When Congress was called to convene, reacting under the failure and destruction of earnings, income, and the taxpaying power, the people were calling for a holiday in road building and highway construction, demanding suspension of all public building and improvements to be met and paid for from taxes. Even the sacred school system was touched with the withering hand of economy. School terms were being cut short or schools were altogether closed. Teachers were reduced in salary or left without pay. One thousand teachers were discharged and left idle for want of taxes to pay salaries. Two hundred thousand schools were closed. Fifteen hundred colleges and commercial schools were shut down. Two and one-half million school children were thrown out of school. Forty million dollars in teachers' wages remained unpaid and in default. And because of the failure of the taxpaying power and the want of the payment of taxes, towns, townships, and counties were defaulting their bonds and contracts, cities were suspending payment, and States were borrowing money to pay current expenses.

When Congress was called and convened to meet the pressing emergencies of the panic, Members were shown an empty Treasury, or a Treasury fast nearing exhaustion, the country facing national bankruptcy. The Treasury was without funds collected; without funds available or in anticipation; without funds to pay congressional and other salaries; without funds to pay wages of employees; without funds to pay pensions and disability allowances. The Government was borrowing money to pay interest, selling bonds to pay running expenses, to pay salaries and wages of employees, and without which pensions and disability allowances could not be met and paid as they accrued. Members of Congress were under pledge and were appealed to by the people to reduce the cost of the Government, to meet the emergencies of the hour, and save the country from the crisis impending, the independent taxpayers from exhaustion, and the Nation from insolvency and bankruptcy.

When the special session was called to convene there were many Members in Congress, for want of prior-service opportunity to observe the course of former administrations, without inside knowledge or information of the assessment and collection of taxes. These Members did not then know that the Treasury had been and was being drained and exhausted of its tax funds by and through the policy of tax rebates, under which the war profiteers were allowed and permitted to reach in and take back all the taxes paid by them and leaving the Treasury exhausted of taxes as fully and completely as if never paid, and that this course has been permitted and allowed to continue for years. These Members did not know that every year since 1926 an average of $400,000,000 of taxes annually have been allowed rebated from the Treasury—enough to pay the soldiers' pensions.

These Members did not know that Morgan, the multimillionaire of the world, was not and had not been paying his income taxes due to the Government for 3 years—1930, 1931, and 1932. These Members did not know that 500 Morgan partners were not and had not been paying and were evading their income taxes. These Members did not know that 89 Morgan banks and trust companies were not and had not been paying their income and corporation taxes. These Members did not know that Andrew Mellon, a former Secretary of the Treasury, was not and had not been paying his income taxes to the Government. These Members did not know that 37 Mellon banks and trust companies were not and had not been paying their income and corporation taxes. These Members did not know that W. E. Mellon, a nephew of Andrew, was withholding two million of income taxes from the Treasury of the Government on an evasive technical plea.

These Members did not know that the amount of taxes necessary and required to meet congressional and other salaries, to pay the wages of public employees and pensions and disability allowances, were but a mere trivial pittance, a mere shovelful of sand upon the weary wastes of the seashore, as compared with the vast income and other taxes which were being rebated and withheld by the manipulating financiers from payment to the Treasury.

During all the debates and the course of consideration over and upon the economy bill involving salaries, wages, and pensions no former Member of Congress under the administration then in power ever gave out to the House or the Senate the vast rebate of taxes permitted, withdrawing funds from the Treasury. No such former Member of Congress ever gave out to the new Congress the failure of the income-tax payments by Morgan and his associates in 1930, 1931, and 1932; and none of which defaults were known until after the economy bill was voted upon.

But this want of knowledge of the facts was not confined to Members alone. The people, demanding of Congress a reduction of salaries, wages, and pensions, did not know of these tax rebates and defaults. Even the soldiers, with the special interests in the funds from which pensions must be paid, did not know of these tax rebates, mounting in multiplied millions of dollars, not of the tax defaults in 1930, 1931, and 1932, leaving the Treasury without available funds for the payment of salaries, wages, and pensions. Neither Members, the people, nor the soldiers were aware of these flagrant tax rebates and defaults, because all had been kept a secret, hidden, covered, and concealed from Congress, the people, and soldiers of the country. It was the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to report these tax rebates and defaults to Congress, as well as the duty of Members of Congress to know, but Mellon and Mills had been Secretary of the Treasury, and Woodin was their successor as Secretary of the Treasury. The first were Morgan's partners and associates, and the last has been shown a Morgan favorite. And there had been no report to Congress and no report to the soldiers or the people.

These fraudulent tax rebates and defaults were not known, realized, or understood until after the economy bill had been voted upon, until the new Senate committee had been appointed and had entered upon its hearings and investigations and reported its findings to Congress. Then there was no denial of the facts. Then it was brazenly and openly admitted by Morgan, Lamont, and other financiers, in an air of triumph in the art of evasion, that they were and had not been paying their income taxes all these years. Then it was first realized and understood that it was not the payment of congressional salaries, nor the payment of the wages of public employees, nor the payment of the pensions to the soldiers which was exhausting and leaving an empty Treasury. Then it was first realized and understood that the cause was allowing the rebates of taxes and the failure to collect income taxes from Morgan, Mellon, and their partners and associates which was leaving the Treasury empty and exhausted and transferring the burdens upon the common taxpayer.

Members in Congress in House and Senate, realizing the plight of the people under the failure of the tax-paying power, without knowledge of the true facts and cause, of the rebate of taxes and the nonpayment of taxes, were led to believe and believing that the failure and exhaustion of the Treasury was due to the failure and inability of the overburdened common people to meet and pay taxes levied upon them. And while so led to believe and believing, voted for the so-called "Economy Act", reducing first their own salaries and the pay of public employees in every Department of the Government. And realizing and being assured that soldiers were alike patriotic in peace and civil life as in war, and for like purpose and intent voted to reduce soldiers' pensions, believing in substantially like amounts.

But this was not all the crime against the Treasury, which was finally and ultimately found, and which had brought an empty Treasury and the Nation face to face with insolvency and bankruptcy. The Treasury had been and was being drained and exhausted of its tax funds, paid in by the common taxpayers, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the administration of so-called "relief measures" in wanton waste and criminal extravagance. And under that administration of which the Government was financing and loaning millions to the banks and trust companies of the country, loaning $89,000,000 from the Treasury to one single bank corporation; financing and loaning millions to the railroads of the country; financing and loaning millions to the insurance companies of the country; financing and loaning vast sums for the payment of debts, obligations, and losses of failing and insolvent corporations, some of which corporations were paying their head officers excessive salaries of $200,000 or more, and under which the Treasury was being exhausted of great parts and portions of the taxes which were being paid in by honest, common taxpayers. And it was due in part to these vast sums which were being taken from the Treasury and not the payment of salaries, wages, or pensions that was exhausting the tax resources.

But even a greater wrong and injustice was realized in the administration of the Economy Act than the destruction of the tax-paying power, than the fraudulent rebate of taxes, than the evasion and nonpayment of taxes, than the wanton waste of flagrant and extravagant appropriations. After the economy bill was passed, instead of the power being exercised under the direction of the President, Veterans' Administrator Hines, long in office, was left in full charge to administer the law, in disregard of the new deal pledge. And instead of reducing soldiers' pensions fairly, tempered with care and justice and equally with the reduction of other pay, as held out under the economy bill, an indiscriminate policy was entered upon, without notice or hearing granted, reducing pensions 50 to 75 percent and striking many pensioners from the rolls.

Instead of the President maintaining control and direction, the operations were turned over to these subordinates and readjustments were made and carried out in Comanche Indian style, as wielding a butcher knife or meat ax, striking promiscuously and indiscriminately, blindfolded, and in the darkness, without evidence heard, submitted, or allowed. And in wanton disregard of promises made to make the reductions fair and tempered with justice, the same as salaries and wages and other pay from the Government, pensions were reduced without humane consideration and disabled and wounded soldiers were stricken from the pension rolls like clinging bugs and beetles from a floating raft in the sea.

When I realized and understood the course of former Congresses in permitting rebates of taxes from the Treasury, allowing war profiteers to reach in and take out millions of the taxes paid, and in allowing the war profiteers, Morgan and the multimillionaires of the world, to default and evade the payment of taxes without protest or action taken to compel their collections as assessed, amounting to millions annually; and when I knew all the facts and realized that the cause of the empty Treasury was not the payment of congressional salaries nor the payment of governmental employees nor the payment of soldiers' pensions; and when I observed the course of this administration allowing Woodin to continue Mellon's polices and permitting Administrator Hines to continue in office to administer the Economy Act and striking thousands of soldiers from the rolls, then I was good and ready to act both on the policy of allowing taxes rebated and on the failure to collect income taxes and on the cruel, heartless administration of the law. And I promptly filed a bill, which was the first bill filed, to repeal the so-called "Economy Act" so far as the same pertained to soldiers' pensions. And to reenact the repealed pension laws, to reinstate soldiers on the pension rolls, and to reduce pensions in the amount of 15 percent the same as salaries and public wages and other pay from the Government.

But repealing the Economy Act will not restore the payment of pensions while the people remain without power to pay taxes, while the rebate of taxes are permitted, while the great financiers are allowed to go exempt or tax free, while vast sums are drawn out to finance gambling financiers. The common taxpayers of the country will not and cannot pay all these taxes. They are already groaning, staggering, falling under the crushing burdens of taxation. The common taxpayers will revolt. They will defy the taxing power of the Government. They will strike against the payment of taxes. They will stop and pay no taxes.

The tax-paying power of the people, the power of labor and the products of labor, the earnings and income of the people, commodity values and the price level, must be restored to them. The vicious rebate system of allowing the Great War profiteers to reach into the Treasury and take back taxes paid must be halted and prohibited. The Morgans and other war profiteers must not only be made to pay their taxes maturing and coming due in the future, but they must be compelled to pay the taxes rebated and already withheld. And unless this is promptly done, the repeal of the Economy Act will be futile and in vain to bring back pensions to the soldiers, or to restore salaries and public wages.

Unless this Congress will restore that tax-paying power of the people, unless this Congress will prohibit the rebate of taxes paid, unless this Congress will exert its power fearlessly and courageously to collect taxes, the next administration coming into power will be confronted with the same crisis that this administration found in the Treasury and the payment of salaries, wages, and pensions must again be reduced and cut down to avoid national insolvency and bankruptcy.

I am sure that it was not in the heart of the President to do any wrong or injustice to the soldiers. Both Congress and the President were facing an empty Treasury and an imperative demand from the people to reduce salaries, wages, and pensions and avoid national insolvency and bankruptcy. It was a physical and mental impossibility for any President, or any one man, to give direction or personal attention to the details of pension adjustments imposed upon him under the Economy Act. It is plain to be realized and understood now that such powers conferred upon the President could only be exercised and administered indirectly by entrusting the same to subordinates, impossible for any one man in a personal way to give direct, personal consideration to individual pension claims. The President, under the Economy Act, was left hopelessly burdened and charged with the exercise of legislation, judicial and Executive power which he could not direct, supervise, or control, but for the administration of the details of which he must stand charged and accountable.

I am sure that it was not in any sense of ingratitude nor from any want of consideration and appreciation of the loyal services of the soldiers that actuated Members of Congress to reduce pensions and disability allowances along with their own salaries and wages. I am sure that it was not the wish and intention of Members to reduce pensions more than salaries and wages or to make such reductions permanent or continuous beyond the crisis to be met and the emergencies confronting them. And I am equally sure and certain that it was not from any disposition of the people who declared for and demanded these reductions of salaries, wages, and pensions to do a wrong or injustice to the soldiers. The President, Congress, and the people were all led to take this action consciously, in discharge of duty, to safeguard the public welfare in the strain of this great tax crisis and to relieve the people of its crushing burdens. And I am equally sure now that the facts known and understood by Congress, and with the cause of the empty Treasury shown and the cruel course of administration observed, this law will be repealed or amended to assure the soldier just and deserving pensions.

If there had been no failure or destruction of the tax-paying power of the people, if there had been no rebate of taxes allowed, no permission of war profiteers to reach in and take back their taxes paid; if there had been no evasion of taxes, no nonpayment of taxes permitted and concealed, leaving men to stop the payment of their taxes without protest or complaint, without action to compel their payment—this economy bill enacted by Congress would have never been filed, would have never been considered, would have never been passed, would have never been heard of. The Members with their salaries, and public employees with their wages, and soldiers with their pensions would have been left unmolested to pursue the even tenor of their ways, taking and enjoying their usual payments of salaries, wages, and pensions.

I have never been in favor of reducing and taking away pensions nor reducing moderate salaries or wages where the same was shown reasonable and fair, where the people were with ample earnings to meet and pay the taxes required. While I was in Congress in 1914, 20 years ago, a bill was brought before the House to take away the pension of soldiers who had left the United States to reside in Canada or other foreign countries. I opposed the bill on the floor of the House and voted to defeat the measure, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will not only show my vote but will show my remarks in opposition to the bill, and the following is what I said:

Mr. Chairman, the average age of the soldier of the Civil War is past 70 years. His allotment of three score years and ten has more than expired. He is standing upon the verge of the grave listening for the bugle of time to call him to the Great Beyond. His final summons is past due. Time has invaded his home, his family is gone. He is alone, hovering over the cold ashes of age in the bleak winter of life. Impelled by the vicissitudes rather than choice he has left the country for which he fought in the vigor of young manhood to live with a son, daughter, or a grandchild, or to pass his few remaining days with some relative or friend of his boyhood in the land of his birth. If you ask why he does not stay in a soldiers' home, I answer because it is not home. He would rather go back to a log cabin with a dirt floor and sleep on a bed of straw, and live with his children, with his oldtime neighbors, to be buried in his own churchyard among the graves of his family and departed friends. I am opposed to taking away the pensions of these old soldiers. A soldier of the Nation in the time of war remains a soldier in time of peace. I believe that once a soldier of this Nation, always a soldier of this Nation.

While I honor the President for sincerity and purpose, I do not agree with the President in what he said at Chicago, that the Federal Government should care for the soldiers in need only when the local communities were unable or the States failed to provide the relief. I do not want to see any soldier whether suffering from service disability or disability incurred prior to service or disability incurred after service wandering in quest of local charity or left begging relief from private charity or benevolence of the State. I do not want to see soldiers left embarrassed, humiliated, begging for aid. I want to see aid granted them freely and promptly as a matter of right, whether the need be for hospital service, or to provide for them and their families the comforts and vital necessaries of life. I do not want to see the soldiers thrown back upon the taxpayers of the State already burdened to the point of endurance nor to take their place in the line, charity and public benevolence, instead of payments for services rendered.

When a citizen has worn the colors he is a soldier of the Nation regardless of service disability. Once a soldier, always a soldier under the care and protection of the Nation. And Congress will not agree with this position of President Roosevelt any more than Congress agreed with Presidents Coolidge and Hoover on the bonus and pension legislation, and Congress will overrule President Roosevelt as Congress overruled or voted to overrule the vetoes of Coolidge and Hoover.

And I do not accept the theory now advanced by some Members of Congress, and who were former Members of Congress, that the cause bringing on the movement to reduce pensions, the demand for governmental economy first began, arose or had its origin only briefly more than a year ago, 1932. I place the cause for the demand for economy as arising at a much earlier date. The cause first began to operate when the war profiteers, in their greed for more money and greater wealth, destroyed the tax-paying power of the people by forcing down values and the price level, beginning and continuing since 1920 and 1929. This first brought the imperative demands for economy in public affairs in every State as well as the Nation, and which finally and ultimately culminated in an economy act in some form in every county in every State as well as this Economy Act in Congress.

The whole public-economy demand resulted from a tax cause, from the growing burdens of taxation, a failure and destruction of the tax-paying power, the failure of sufficient taxes to meet the payment from the Treasury; resulted from the policy of allowing tax rebates, allowing financiers to reach in and take out the taxes paid by them to the Treasury, from the failure to collect taxes from Morgan and his partners in 1930, 1931, and 1932. Under this failure the war profiteers took advantage of their own wrong, took advantage of their own defaults in rebating and evading taxes to initiate the economy movement and to reduce salaries, wages, and pensions and thereby to escape still further taxes.

As the germs of disease are long lurking in the flesh before their evils are manifest and begin to prey upon the body, and as the seeds are sown in the ground in a long period before the harvest comes, so the deeds of this economy demand to reduce salaries, wages, and pensions were sown long before the Economy Act, long before the harvest of tax evasions were repealed in the whirlwind of demand for economy. The seeds of the economy demand for reduction of salaries, wages, and pensions were first sown in the fall of values and the price level, resulting from the withdrawal of money from circulation, beginning and continuing from 1920 to 1929, destroying the tax-paying power of the people. The seeds of economy were further sown in the system of tax rebates, beginning in 1926 and continuing until 1933, permitting and allowing these same war profiteers to reach in and take back the taxes paid and collected from them. The seeds of economy were further sown in allowing and permitting these same war profiteers to stop and evade the payment of all taxes when they paid no taxes in 1930, 1931, and 1932. And as men sow so shall they reap. And the harvest of tax evasions came, and the failure of the tax-paying power in the Nation, and in every State, in the burdens of taxes upon the people, and the demand for tax reduction.

Certain Members of Congress and who were Members of Congress when the war profiteers conceived and conspired to destroy the tax-paying power of the people, or when the conspiracy was exposed before Congress in 1923, and who were Members of Congress when these same manipulating financiers entered upon the policy of rebating taxes, the practice of reaching in and taking back the taxes paid and collected from them, and who were Members of Congress when these same international financiers stopped the payment of all taxes and were allowed to evade the payment of all taxes for the 3 years of 1930, 1931, and 1932, are now charging this Congress with being a cowardly Congress and the Members of this Congress with being cowardly Members of Congress, with sacrificing the soldiers' pensions to appease the demands of war profiteers.

It is not my purpose to charge any Congress with being a disloyal or cowardly Congress, nor any Members of Congress as cowardly Members of Congress, in allowing tax rebates and evasions, draining and leaving the Treasury exhausted. But any Member of Congress who was a Member of Congress from and since February 24, 1923, the date of the exposure of the bankers' conspiracy to contract the volume and supply of money and destroy the tax-paying power of the people, and who cannot point to a step taken nor where he lifted his hand or raised his voice to avenge that great economic crime or protest against that financial conspiracy and to restore that tax-paying power back to the people, and who was a Member of Congress from and since the year 1926, when these same war profiteers entered upon the course of rebating taxes, reaching in and taking from the Treasury all or a greater part of the taxes paid by them, and who cannot point to a step taken nor where he lifted his hand nor raised his voice to stop or prohibit this vicious practice, and who was a Member of Congress when these same war profiteers stopped the payment of taxes in 1930, 1931, and 1932, and wealth was allowed to evade all taxes, and who cannot point to a step taken nor where he raised his hand or lifted his voice to enforce the tax laws and compel these financiers to pay their taxes, is not in position or good-faith standing to charge any Congress as being a cowardly Congress, nor any Member of Congress as being a cowardly Member of Congress, nor to make any claim or pretense as being a courageous Member of Congress.

I may not be able to succeed in restoring the tax-paying power of the people or preventing the rebate of taxes paid. I may fail in my resolution or determination to compel the collection of taxes from multimillionaire taxpayers the same as from the common taxpayers. But I am positive and determined that if the financiers cannot be made to pay their evasion of the payment of taxes will not be kept a secret, hidden, covered, and concealed. The failure will be made known to the people and be made known to the soldiers. And the next Congress convening will not be compelled to appoint a committee empowered to subpena witnesses and compel the production of books and papers to uncover concealed evidence and expose tax rebates and evasions mounting into the multiplied millions.

Or if I quail or stand paralyzed or palsied before wealth and high social position and fail to demand the restoration of the tax-paying power, or permit income taxes paid rebated, or if I fail to sound the alarm or warning or stand idly by in fear and trembling and allow great financiers to default their taxes for 3 years, I promise and make this pledge, I will not assume great zeal and courage before the people and the country in defense of soldiers' pensions, nor manifest the brazen effrontery to charge another Congress as a cowardly Congress or other Members of Congress as cowardly Members of Congress. [Applause.]

There is a lesson and a moral in this economy legislation, both relating to laborers and wage earners and the soldiers of the country. It was Abraham Lincoln who said:

> No people or country can long endure half free and half slave, that the power enslaving one part will encroach to enslave the other part.

And all human experience has declared the wisdom, and history has confirmed the truth of what Abraham Lincoln said, that no people can long endure half slave and half free. When the international financiers and bankers conspired to multiply the value of their bonds by forcing down commodity values and the price level, first depressing farm property and products and destroying the farmer's buying and consuming power, the industrial laboring classes, busy in the factories producing for farm consumption, were unmindful of the final result, were indifferent to the farmer's failure, and scoffed at his complaints and demands.

But what Lincoln said was true. No people can long endure half slave and half free, and one part of the people cannot remain prosperous while another part is suffering want and distress. And when the farmers' failure of buying and consuming power finally, ultimately, and in time, had reached back from retail store through wholesale house to factory, and for want of orders stopped production, the laboring men were thrown out of employment and industrial labor suffered in loss of wages. And when the farmers and laboring men both suffered from a fall of values and the price level and the destruction of the buying and consuming power, the soldiers failing to realize the truth of what Lincoln had said, relied upon the taxing power to force the collection of taxes from the people for the payment of their pension payments. But what Lincoln said still remained the truth among men. And the same causes operating to destroy the buying and consuming power of the farmers and the laborers of the country destroyed their taxpaying power. And when the farmers and laboring people failed in their power to pay taxes, and the Treasury was left empty, the demand for public economy came from every county in every State for the reduction of wages and pensions and the soldiers suffered with the farmers and laboring men.

What Lincoln said was true. No people can long endure one half free and the other half slave. And one part of a people under a great industrial system cannot long remain in prosperity while the other is suffering in want. Men are bound together in a common cause. The prosperity of one insures the prosperity of another. The suffering and want of one class will finally, ultimately, and in time bring suffering and want to another class. We are our brother's keeper. His prosperity is our prosperity. His happiness is our happiness. His welfare is our welfare.

What Lincoln said was true. Men must all suffer together. They must all rejoice together. They must realize that their prosperity is linked to and dependent upon each other. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who speak on the bill have permission to extend their own remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, when I listened to the debate upon the rule yesterday there occurred to my mind a story that appeared in one of the newspapers along last spring when we were in special session. In fact it was not so much a story as a narrative incident of a bird that had become confined in a room of a dwelling house in Washington when the window accidentally fell. The occupants of the dwelling house watched the bird hour after hour rushing against the window, pecking on the window pane, seeking to find outlet and release, seeking to fly into the air of freedom to enjoy liberty of action. I observed, and you gentlemen have observed one Member after another come into the well of this House yesterday, flying against the illusion of this gag rule which promised so much. Each one somehow fell back exhausted in spirit and hope and finally were overwhelmed by numerical strength. It occurred to me at the time as I listened to the assurances of the leaders that I had an experience similar to that out in South Dakota some 7 or 8 years ago when I was out there selling books. I remember a farmer who yelled to me from the porch when I was approaching his place. A big rangy police dog came running out and the farmer said, "That dog won't bite", but when I came into the yard, that dog did bite, much to my regret. Now, while this rule may not particularly preclude us from the benefits that we sought to achieve for the Federal employees and the veterans, I am reasonably sure that in actual practice, under the procedure of this House we are going to find that that rule does bite despite all glib assurances. It occurs to me that under that rule, what we are seeking to perpetuate in this bill, with respect to the veterans and employees of the United States Government is simply a reversal of the old formula. You will recall that they used to say, when a young man and a young woman were ready to sally forth into the fields of romance, it was quite common to say that two could live as cheaply as one. It seems to me that we have reversed that sentiment. Now we are going to say that two can starve as cheaply as one.

The contention has been that there has been and is misery, anguish, and despair in the land; that there has been a lack of proper wages in the fields of private industry and enterprise; and since that seems to apply to some 10,000,000 or 11,000,000 of our fellow citizens, therefore it would be good logic to take those who have an opportunity to live in the higher brackets and somehow nullify their more advantageous purchasing power by bringing them down to the lower level and keeping them there. You gentlemen on the Democratic side had this experience when back home this past summer. You remember the picture of Uncle Sam, with his silk hat and an outstretched hand, which General Johnson issued as a part of the recovery program. It looks at you from every Federal building, from every post office and customs house in the United States of America. He is pointing his finger at those who come into the Federal buildings and says to them, "Buy now." I say to you gentlemen, as you think of the civil employees of this country, with what are they going to buy, if you are not going to restore in toto the margin of purchasing power that was taken away under the provisions of Public Act No. 2? I venture to say, gentlemen, that, if the President of the United States could in a first-hand way sit at the firesides and hearthstones of America, if he could see the destitution, the grief, and despair, if he could see the anxiety and envision the misery that has gone along with the pay cut, he would not sanction the kind of rule that was introduced here for the consideration of this bill.

Now, what has been your experience and mine? I remember sitting in the office this summer and having many of my constituency come to seek counsel and sympathy. Many of them were members of Uncle Sam's personnel, from whom the 15 percent has been taken, and who cannot, by the exercise of the most extreme frugality, avoid going into the red, and forestall foreclosure and bankruptcy. I have had the experience of women coming up to grab me by the lapels and say, "For God's sake, can't you do something? This little home is all we have in the world. It represents the savings and frugality of a lifetime. Now the spectral hand of foreclosure is beginning to stealthily reach out and take away that which was ours, because the pay cut that was enacted last March, makes it impossible to continue the payments."

They say that the figures from the Department of Labor indicate that the index of living costs has increased very little.

My friends, I do not have so much confidence in the figures that have been presented to justify a denial of pay restoration with the exception of 5 percent after June 1934, and I shall tell you why. When I came here in late December I called the Department of Labor and I said, "Gentlemen, I should like to know the precise basis of your living-cost index on which the continuation of the pay cut is likely to be predicated. Where and how do you get the figures? How are they interrelated?"

Mr. Lubin, of the Department of Labor Statistics, sent me the sheaf of questionnaires which I hold in my hand. These were sent out to sources in 32 different cities in the United States. From the information that was assembled on these questionnaires, they seek to determine precisely what the living index is as compared with the index of 1928. Now, gentlemen, I confess a certain bewilderment, I confess a certain confusion about these figures, particularly so, because an undue amount of emphasis on one class of commodities or another will altogether alter the ultimate figure.

Examine these schedules sent out by the Department of Labor, and you will not find a single allusion to monthly building and loan installments and building and loan interest, which has remained a static item in many a family budget not only from 1928 on down but even previous to that time; and where the family income has been reduced from $35 or $40 a week to $25 or $30 a week, you can readily see that fixed obligations on the home loom up 40 percent larger in the curtailed budget of 1933 than it would back in 1928. I see no allusion in these schedules to taxes. That is a static element that has not only continued but actually increased since 1928. The figures that they are submitting to show reduced living costs or costs which have raised but slightly are subject to various interpretations and are scarcely conclusive as warranting a continuation of even two thirds of the existing pay cut.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. SISSON. Has the gentleman from Illinois, during the period since the special session until the time we came here for the regular session, noticed any dearth in applications made to the gentleman for jobs in the Federal service?

Mr. DIRKSEN. A dearth of applications?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. DIRKSEN. No; and there is a perfectly good reason for it, with 11,000,000 people out of work. That does not indicate anything nor is it conclusive. They always apply in good times and bad, and a few applications more or less does not make any difference.

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman think they apply in such numbers as they have lately, even since the reduction in salaries of 15 percent?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I am not sure about the numbers, but it is large enough so that it does not alter the situation one bit. Now to proceed, I find in this schedule sent out by the Department of Labor, that among 18 or 20 listed items of women's apparel, they refer to the price of corsets. They might just as well include bustles and a lot of other archaic contrivances that women used to wear. What a singular index it would be, if they attached as much importance, or laid as much emphasis on the price of corsets as they did on the cost of staple silk hose. They include an item on the cost of obstetrical work at hospitals. Fancy any family of a Federal employee wanting to bring a baby into the world, after such a pay curtailment of 15 percent. Why let that sort of thing, irrespective of the amount of emphasis that has been placed upon it, appear in a schedule of information that is designed to show the living index for 1933? I can understand living costs much better when I go to the merchandising manager of a chain of 70 grocery stores in central Illinois for information. I said, the basket of staple commodities—the kind that most families use and which sold for a dollar in the winter of 1932—what would the same basket of groceries cost now?

The figures I obtained from the merchandising manager of these 70 retail houses is that the group of staples which cost $1 in the Christmas season of 1932 would cost $1.37 in the Christmas season of 1933. I do not know much about Mr. Lubin's statistics in the Department of Labor, and I am not so sure that I have any faith in them. It looks to me like there is a lot of piffle and balderdash in those figures, but I can understand when a grocer, who operates 70 outlets, tells me that staples have gone up 37 percent, and that the increase has to be taxed against the consumer.

Groceries, taxes, building and loan installments, and fuel—the principal items in the family budget—have all increased to a point which justifies a restoration of pay.

Therefore, because it must be apparent to you who have come back from all over this country, that there is an appreciation in the living cost of all staples and ordinary clothing, and that sort of thing, far in excess of what has been disclosed by these fictitious index values that come from the Department of Labor, it seems to me that the restoration of the pay cut should not be denied.

After all, why not? Let me read you from the Budget what we are going to expend up to the 1st of July 1934, for other purposes to aid recovery and rebuild purchasing power.

One billion six hundred and seventy-seventy million dollars for public works; but nothing for the Federal employee. $103,000,000 for the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I voted for the bill and I am in sympathy with the idea, but when we spend that much for agriculture, why not a little for the thousands of Federal pay-rollers?

Forty million dollars for farm credits. Why not a little for the civil pay roll?

Three hundred and forty-one million for emergency service work, for the "reforestation army." I voted for it. I supported it. I went among my people this summer and told them I had faith in the President of the United States and asked them to support his policy, but that is no particular reason why we may not constructively criticize and direct his attention to the fact that to retain from the Federal employees this 15 percent in pay is altogether at variance with the general recovery program.

Three billion nine hundred and sixty-nine million dollars for the Reconstruction Corporation. What for? Oh, for banks, railroads, and all these other instrumentalities.

Nineteen million dollars for the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Fifty-two million dollars for the Federal land banks.

One hundred and fifty million dollars for the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation.

Four million dollars for the National Recovery Administration.

And while these expenditures are being made in behalf of every class of people for the purpose of giving momentum to the recovery program, why not give it just a little more stimulus by restoring to the Federal employee that necessary margin that will make it possible for him, through the exercise of increased purchasing power, to become an integral part of the recovery program?

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Suppose we stopped all this tremendous expenditure you fellows are kicking about——

Mr. DIRKSEN. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FORD. Suppose we just went back to March 4, 1933, and called it a day. We would then balance the Budget and the millions who are being employed by the C.W.A., the P.W.A., the N.R.A., and these other agencies would be dropped, and the help that is going to the farmers and all the rest of the recovery program would stop. Is this what you and your fellow Members on the Republican side want?

Mr. DIRKSEN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. FORD. Why does not the gentleman, to be fully consistent, ask that we do that?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I assure the gentleman I am not at variance with the program generally. I am simply trying to include also this element whose purchasing power has been decreased, and to point out the hypocrisy of saying to them from the Federal buildings of the country: "Buy now", when they have not the wherewithal with which to buy.

Mr. FORD. Suppose they had no work; what then?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DIRKSEN. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I wonder if the sudden solicitude on that side of the aisle is not occasioned by the fact that practically 99 percent of the Federal employees are Republicans, and that they were held over from last year and not replaced by Democrats as you gentlemen thought when you voted to put the 15-percent cut into effect. Now that you see we still retain the Republicans you are voting to raise their salaries.

Mr. DIRKSEN. I may point out to the gentleman from Kentucky that I have tried to be consistent by voting against the provisions of the economy bill, and I still feel that it was a travesty on justice. It indicates why I now believe the full 15-percent pay cut for the ordinary civil employee should be restored.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, inspired and guided by the President of the United States, we, in the early days of this Congress, took up the fight of our people to preserve the home, the farm, the job; indeed, all of our cherished institutions. We participated in a vigorous and virile attack upon the forces of destruction rampant in the Nation.

Our great President, in quick and rapid-fire succession, advanced bill after bill which we enacted into law, all designed to relieve the distress of our people and promote economic recovery. The amazing and effective offensive lodged by the President reminded us forcibly of the patriotic stand of Bundy at Belgium, when he said "The American flag knows no retreat."

We thus dealt with social questions and far-reaching economic problems. We are here again to strengthen and make full and complete the program of economic recovery. In truth, this Congress might well be known in days to come as the "economic Congress."

Nevertheless, we have not yet weighed a question of great economic importance to the Nation. It is a matter which, I believe, should emanate from Congress, involving as it does a moral view. But it is logically a part of the "new deal." Its economic value is impelling, and since Congress has not gone to the quickly available source of revenue which it offers, I am bringing it to the Congress for its consideration and, I hope, favorable action. The controversy over the bill under debate unquestionably raises a cry for more revenue; we are morally ready to see things as they are; repeal of prohibition proves this; we should not delay.

Prohibition was a great moral question, perhaps the greatest since the abolition of slavery. Repeal came ultimately; but it was the urge of its economic importance which undoubtedly swayed our people to act as quickly as they did, although we were and still are cultivating once more the spirit of liberty and liberalism in America.

The independent offices appropriation bill now before us causes us to think, and think seriously, of a solution of the problem which it presents. Economy is its watchword. But economy should not weigh so heavily upon many who are affected by it. Nor should the veteran and his dependents suffer while there is an available and effective means of relief to the taxpayer capable of removing all objection to the restoration of former benefits. I, for one, feel that I must be guided by the President in his recommendation on this bill, since the responsibility of the well-being of the Nation rests primarly upon him; but I strongly believe that our liberality toward the veteran and his dependents should not be confined to a budget raised by involuntary taxes which are compulsory and open to evasion, when there is an avenue open through which a vast sum can be realized by a voluntary tax which would not be a burden upon any taxpayer but which would be entirely optional and paid by those only who wished to contribute and pay.

And so I come to the ways and means of providing adequately for the veteran and his dependents. I do not make my proposal as a substitute for the obligation which rests upon the Government to grant them just consideration. Rather, it would be a means to that end and serve to remove any objection that the Government cannot afford to take care of those who are entitled to proper care and treatment at its hands. The Government cannot evade its duty to raise the funds necessary for that purpose, particularly where they are available from thousands upon thousands of our citizens who are ready, willing, and anxious to contribute and await only the approval of the Government.

I am advocating, ladies and gentlemen, a national lottery to be conducted under Government auspices by an agency such as the Veterans' Administration as a source of additional revenue to the Nation to enable us adequately to care for our veterans and their dependents, better provide for Government workers, including the long-suffering postal employees, and at the same time relieve the strain upon the taxpayer. It would more than make up the cuts which have been applied to veterans and their dependents, and all pay cuts. The Nation's income would be vastly increased to meet the demands of the Budget. It would solve and more than solve the problem presented by the appropriation bills.

At the last session of Congress I introduced bill, H.R. 5981, which was intended to pave the way for the establishment of a lottery by which we could derive a revenue resorted to today by many of the governments of the world.

Since the introduction of my bill France has enacted a law which was intended to perpetuate the allowances payable to veterans and their dependents without any curtailment in this time of economic stress. France estimates a return from its lottery which will yield an annual revenue of 8,000,000,000 francs. If we in America can do as well, we shall be able to raise by such means, with the franc at a little over 6 cents, the grand total of $500,000,000. But we can do better, I believe, and there is a possibility of an ultimate yield of $1,000,000,000.

The lottery has financed churches of nearly every denomination and made possible the upbuilding of many other institutions which we are glad to support through the medium of the lottery or chance contribution. Not only have we engaged in this practice for worthy institutions at home, but we are yearly contributing millions of dollars to institutions of foreign nations by the purchase of lottery tickets sent to our citizens from abroad.

Many of our people contribute, too, to private lotteries which are conducted secretly and in violation of law for the benefit of the individuals who operate them, often dishonestly. How much more satisfactory it would be to patronize a national lottery honestly conducted.

Our Government is not receiving a penny from a business of gigantic proportions. It could have, without hardship to anyone, a tremendous yield. Will we not be derelict in our duty if we do not seek this revenue which is so much needed for so many worthy causes during the economic storm which is slowly but too slowly disappearing over the horizon? However your vote may be recorded on this bill, it should be the firm resolve of each and every Member to work and vote for a lottery which will insure for the future full veterans' benefits and restored pay cuts. Besides, we owe it to the taxpayer.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, the rule adopted by the House yesterday gives no one of its Members the right to make any change whatever in the bill (H.R. 6663) under consideration. When we adopted the Economy Act in the special session we saw fit to take a part of the income from a certain class of people in the United States. What the amount of their income was made no difference under the Economy Act.

I was appalled yesterday when I heard the number of thousands of Federal employees who received less than $1,000 a year, yet who were compelled to yield 15 percent of that meager income. From the day last spring when we acted on the economy bill, to this very day there has come to my desk letters and appeals from all parts of my district asking: "For God's sake, isn't there some way to return this pitiful amount of money that has been taken from me?"

Under this bill 5 percent is to be restored on July 1, 1934. I call attention to page 30 of the bill before the House; section (b)—105, that Members of Congress and other employees in the higher brackets are also to have 5 percent of their pay restored. I doubt if there is a Member of this House who would not be willing to agree that no part of the 15 percent taken from him under the Economy bill be restored at this time but would agree to restore the full 15 percent cut to the Federal employees receiving less, we will say, than $2,000 a year. I should be glad to vote to continue the 15 percent cut on my pay, and so would you. But you are not permitted to do it under the rule adopted yesterday.

The Government of the United States went forth and said to business, to industry, and to the manufacturing interests of the country: "You increase pay; you cut down your hours of labor; you shorten the working hours of the laboring man; you raise prices. If you do this, you can fly the blue eagle in your window."

It is to be regretted that the Government of the United States itself has not the right honorably to head the list of the people of this Nation who have gladly subscribed to this program. Instead the Government says to the people of this country, "You do as I say; but don't you do as I do, because I want to reduce the amount of employment in my own establishment and at the same time reduce the pay of my own employees."

Not only has the Government's program adversely affected thousands and thousands of employees in the Postal Service of the Nation and other departments of the Government, but also it has affected the disabled veterans, the people least able to stand the cut. How much better it would be if this House should see fit today to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations in order that some of the obviously harsh and unfair provisions appearing in it could be corrected.

The wholesale prices of commodities in this country as of November 18, 1933, have increased 20 percent. The mayor of the city of Detroit told the common council of that city less than 3 weeks ago that the cost of living in Detroit, Mich., the fourth city in the United States, had increased 26 percent since the 4th day of March last, and yet we are proposing by this bill to restore only 5 percent of the pay taken away by the Economy Act. It has been the aim of the administration to raise prices, and available data indicates that it has been successful in doing so. On page 506 of the RECORD of this House yesterday, is a letter from General Hines, of the Veterans' Administration, to the distinguished member of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], stating that the estimated increase of commodity prices over 1933 are:

	Percent
Stationery and office supplies	11 to 63
Medical and hospital supplies	20 to 89
Orthopedic supplies	25 to 50
Fuel and fuel oil	50 to 150
Wearing apparel and sewing supplies	23 to 120
Provisions	8 to 90

The credit of the United States should not be maintained at the expense of the small wage earner of the Government and the disabled veterans, in face of the fact that we are now spending public money at a rate never equaled in the history of the Nation.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield 5 minutes to the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. DIMOND].

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, what I have to say concerns only Federal employees in the Territory of Alaska, and since Alaska is a Territory, it is obvious, of course, that most of the positions are filled by employees of the United States and not by Territorial employees. The people there who work for the Federal Government feel that they have been discriminated against, and I feel that they have been discriminated against, in all of these economy acts, including the bill which is now before the House for action, or that part of it which will continue in effect, if passed, the pay-cut provisions of the Economy Act of 1933.

I say that they are being discriminated against for this reason: In the Territory of Alaska the cost of living of the Federal employees, and of everyone else, is anywhere from 75 percent to 185 percent higher than in the nearest part of the United States geographically to the Territory of Alaska, namely, the State of Washington.

I now ask unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD as a part of my remarks schedules of comparative costs of the necessaries of life in the State of Washington and in the Territory of Alaska, together with a letter concerning the same.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. EDMISTON). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alaska?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Comparative statement of prices in Seattle and Anchorage, Jan. 3, 1933

	Unit	Seattle	Anchorage	Increase	Percent increase
Apples, fancy, 125's	Box	$1.00	$3.00	$2.00	200.0

KETCHIKAN CHAIN-STORE PRICES OBTAINED

While the foregoing Seattle prices, taken from the Seattle Daily Times, were no doubt sales prices, at the same time, Ketchikan prices quoted of the same date, or approximately the same date, were given by United Grocery Co. and other chain stores whose prices are from 10 to 15 percent lower than other stores in Ketchikan where charge accounts are carried.

In spite of chain-store prices being compared with Seattle advertised special prices, it is ascertained that the actual cost of necessary food commodities in Ketchikan, Alaska, average 75 percent higher than the advertised Seattle prices.

OTHER ITEMS WHICH ARE 75 PERCENT AND MORE HIGHER

In addition to the foregoing listed articles, other conditions should be considered, such as coal and wood for fuel, cost per kilowatt-hour for electricity, rents, and cost of amusements, which are all at least 75 percent higher than Seattle prices.

It is necessary to burn wood, coal, or electricity for heating purposes the year around in Ketchikan to maintain comfortable temperature in homes. During the winter months electric light is necessary all day long and, due to excessive rainy weather, it is used early summer evenings.

TRANSPORTATION COSTS HIGH

Ketchikan to Seattle and return:

Upper deck	$56
Lower deck	50

From these figures it can be seen that on present salaries it is impracticable, and in most cases impossible, for Government employees to take their families to the United States for vacations which are very needed. Considering the average Government employee's family to consist of five members, of which the average of four would have to pay full adult fares and one child's, or half, fare in order to take a vacation in the United States (where most of their homes really are), it would cost at least:

From Ketchikan to Seattle and return $225

HIGH COST AND DIFFICULTIES IN SECURING COLLEGE EDUCATION

While education in Alaska is considered very good, there are only a few accredited high schools in the Territory from which graduates can enter universities and in most cases then they have to pass a very rigid examination before they may enter. Due mainly to two factors—one is that the high-school standards, though supposedly accredited, are not sufficient to permit entry without examination and the other is that most of the Pacific coast universities have about all the students they can care for without taking on additional outside students.

At the very least and under the most favorable conditions the question of education, especially higher education, for the boys and girls of Alaska is a matter of very grave concern and one that should not be overlooked in our plea for justice. Granting that it is possible for all of them to enter the University of Washington the cost would be greater than for a student to go from Seattle to Chicago and attend the University of Illinois. Therefore the matter of education for the children of Federal workers is of grave concern and there is no reason why under a Government like the United States of America that Alaskan children should not have at least an even break with the children of the 48 States within the confines of the Union.

JUNEAU, ALASKA, March 7, 1933.

Hon. ANTHONY J. DIMOND,

Alaska Delegate to Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DIMOND: Reference is made to our conversation in Juneau regarding the possibility of reductions in the salaries of Alaskan Federal employees.

Although the last Congress voted against making any further reductions, it is quite possible that this question will come up again, and if it does it is hoped that you will use your influence against it.

While from many standpoints Federal employees must and do expect to bear their share of the weight of the present economic depression, it is felt that an additional cut would be disproportionately heavy on Alaska employees since Alaska has not shared to the same extent as continental United States in the reduction in commodity prices, rents, transportation rates, and other features that enter into the cost of living. It is strongly urged on behalf of the Alaska Federal employees, therefore, that an effort be made to keep any additional reduction to a minimum, or to eliminate it entirely.

The situation in Alaska regarding living costs is indicated clearly in a study that has been made of certain items of cost to the average family in Juneau in 1929 and 1932, as compared with the cost to the average family in continental United States in these same years. The study was based principally on the cost of the supply of staple foods needed by the average family for 1 year, which supply is itemized in Department of Labor statistics. The average prices of these foods in continental United States in the years mentioned above are given in the Handbook of Labor Statistics, 1931 edition, and Monthly Labor Review for 1931–32, both of which are publications of the Department of Labor. The Juneau prices were obtained from Federal retail-purchase vouchers for 1929 and from present retail quotations.

The Labor Department statistics show that the staple food supplies required by the average family in continental United States dropped in price between 1929 and 1932, a total of 32.0 percent. Over the same period the price of the identical food supplies in Alaska dropped only 11.7 percent.

The Labor Department shows that the average price of bituminous coal to consumers in continental United States dropped from $9 per ton in 1929 to $8.03 in 1932, a reduction of 11 percent. The price of bituminous coal in Juneau in 1929 was $17 per ton, and has not since been reduced. Coal occupies a very large place among the items of cost of living in Alaska.

Time Magazine, in a recent article on rents in the United States, showed that Seattle rents have come down 33⅓ percent since the start of the depression. There has been no general or material reduction in Juneau, and this is the highest item of cost in the family budget here.

It is impossible to give any figures on the reduction in clothing costs for the average family, but returning travelers from the States report a drop in individual items that are far greater than any reductions in local stores.

Transportation, drugs, magazines, moving-picture show tickets, haircuts, newspapers, and many other of the miscellaneous purchases and services that represent a cost to the average family have been reduced only slightly or not at all.

It must be remembered also that everything used by the average family has always been higher in Alaska than in the States. The reductions or lack of reductions quoted above are from this high "Alaska price" and not from the average continental United States prices. For example, coal in Juneau, as mentioned above, is $17 to $18 per ton, while the average price in the United States is $8.03. When butter costs 33½ cents in Juneau it retailed in the States for 24 cents; drugs are always 25 percent to 35 percent higher; newspapers are 10 cents per copy versus 2 cents to 5 cents; haircutting is 65 cents as against 50 cents or less.

Costs of higher education and medical attention are materially greater for Alaskans than for residents of the States, owing to the necessity of journeying to Seattle or points more distant in order to attend any school above high school and to obtain specialized medical service. These matters can best be illustrated by concrete examples. The writer's daughter is attending Oregon State College at an annually increased cost over students who reside in that State of at least $150 for out-of-State tuition and $84 steamship fare from Juneau to Seattle and return. Again, the writer's 11-year-old son has defective eyesight which cannot be treated in Juneau satisfactorily. He was taken to Seattle in each of the past 2 years and must soon be taken again. The cost of the first trip was $140 and of the second $70. In the latter case the trip was combined with one for another purpose. The third trip now to be taken will cost $150. There is nothing unusual about such trips for medical treatment—hardly a month passes but some one from the Juneau Federal service goes south for such purpose. The sending of children to college must likewise be regarded as a necessary expense. There is no question but that the Federal employee living in the States has a material advantage in these things over the one stationed in Alaska.

I wish to reiterate that Alaskan Federal employees have not objected to reasonable adjustments in salaries commensurate with the changed living costs and the present economic situation, but we feel quite strongly that living costs in Alaska have not dropped to the extent that has occurred in the States, and that a general reduction applied here would discriminate against Alaskan employees.

It is strongly urged, therefore, that Federal employes in Alaska be considered in a separate class if any further reduction is proposed.

Very sincerely yours,

M. L. MERRITT,
President Juneau Federal Employees Union.

Mr. DIMOND. We find, therefore, according to this schedule, the accuracy of which cannot be questioned, that in the city of Anchorage, on January 3, 1933, the average cost of the necessaries of life in that city was 185.76 percent higher than in the city of Seattle, Wash.

This would seem to indicate that whatever may be the necessity for extending the Economy Act generally the Territory of Alaska should be exempt from its provisions.

The other schedule which I have incorporated in the RECORD, and which was very carefully compiled from prices in the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, the city in Alaska nearest to the United States, and from prices of the same articles at the same time in Seattle, Wash., shows that the cost of the necessaries of life—that is to say, the cost of living—in the city of Ketchikan is 75 percent higher than in the city of Seattle Wash., that being the city in the United States nearest to the Territory of Alaska.

We further find from these data that the relative costs of living in Alaska did not go down to the same extent that they did in the United States proper between 1929 and 1932. According to these figures—and they are taken, as has been stated to me, from data of the Department of Labor—the cost of living in the United States proper during that period decreased on the average 32 percent, while in the city of Ketchikan the reduction was only 11.7 percent. This means, of course, that in the Territory of Alaska, as elsewhere, reduction in the salaries and compensation of Federal employees is a reduction in purchasing power, because, outside of three or four offices—that is, the district judges of Alaska and the general manager of the Alaska Railroad—there is no opportunity to save; the salaries are not sufficient. I should say that not one out of a hundred Federal employees in Alaska is able to save a cent; all their pay goes for the necessaries of life.

That is important, but not so important, in the view I take here, as is the fact that the cost of living is such that by the reduction in pay now under the Economy Act—and contemplated for the next fiscal year—the Federal employees of the Territory of Alaska have been borne down upon harder than the employees of the Federal Government in any other part of the United States.

Of course, I cannot offer an amendment under the rule—and I am not quarreling with the rule at this time—but I do appeal to the committee to take this carefully into consideration and exempt Alaska from the provisions of the Economy Act. I have tried to secure a separate examination of the cost of living for the Territory of Alaska. I addressed the President upon the subject, but my letter was referred to the Director of the Budget. The Director of the Budget advised me that under the Economy Act no separate study of the cost of living could be made for Alaska; so our only hope for relief is in Congress.

I fully realize, of course, that under the rule which was adopted yesterday for the consideration of this bill it is not in order for me to offer any amendment, and that the only amendments which may be considered are those offered by the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the bill. I therefore appeal to the members of the committee at this time, after consideration of the facts and figures which I am presenting here, the truth of which, I am convinced, is beyond doubt, to exempt the Federal employees in Alaska from continuation of the pay cut, at least after June 30, 1934. It will be very simple and easy to do this. All that is necessary is to provide that the pay cut of Federal employees provided by the Economy Acts of 1932 and 1933, and further extended generally by this bill, shall not be in force in the Territory of Alaska after June 30, 1934.

All that I ask for my neighbors in Alaska who are in the employ of the United States is fair, just, and equitable treatment—treatment that is fair and just and equitable as compared with the treatment of those who are in the employ of the Federal Government in the United States proper. The application of these Economy Acts, involving pay cuts of Federal employees, to the Territory of Alaska does not give them the fair consideration to which they are entitled by elementary principles of equity, justice, and morals.

It is important in this connection to remember that those who work for the Federal Government in Alaska do not receive any greater compensation, any higher pay, than those who work for the Federal Government in the continental United States. They have no special privileges. They have no additional benefits. Why, then, when they are obliged to pay anywhere from 75 to 185 percent more for the necessaries of life—why, I say—should their compensation be reduced 8⅓ percent, or 15 percent, or 10 percent? They are penalized to begin with by working in the Territory of Alaska, because the cost of living is so much higher there. They are penalized in other ways. So it seems to me particularly unjust that they should again be subject to further penalties by reduction of the very meager pay which they received prior to the passage of the Economy Act of 1932. If they were in the same position with respect to cost of living as the Federal employees in the continental United States, I would not say one word on this bill, because the general tenor and effect of it will be amply considered by others in this House and at the other end of the Capitol. Of course, I deplore the necessity which has impelled the President to ask for further continuation of the pay cut. I deplore the terrible necessity which impelled him to ask for it in the first place and which impelled Congress to pass the two Economy Acts of 1932 and 1933. But even though Alaska is far away and even though employees of the Government there are relatively few in number and it is difficult for them to make their wants known, still the dictates of wisdom as well as the dictates of justice should lead the members of the Committee on Appropriations to take into consideration the special situation of the employees of the Federal Government in Alaska and exempt them from any further pay cuts, at least after the expiration of the current fiscal year.

I do not like to overstate any case, but I believe this is a case which cannot be overstated. The facts are simple and plain to anyone who will give them a moment's consideration. A numerically small but nevertheless important body of women and men who work for the United States Government are being discriminated against and are being unfairly and unjustly treated simply because they happen to reside in a remote Territory, through the pay cuts to which they are subject under these Economy Acts.

Mr. Chairman, the women and men who are in the employ of the Federal Government in Alaska are American citizens, and they appeal, through me, not for special privileges, not for favors, but for justice. They are as fine a body of women and men as one will find anywhere. Many of them—many of them have exhibited and are daily exhibiting in their work in Alaska a spirit of self-sacrifice and devotion to the common welfare which is all too rare in or out of public service. Many of them are living on what is now the last frontier of the country. They are necessarily deprived of the usual comforts and ordinary conveniences of life. They bear their burdens without a murmur. Their lives are generally a credit to the community and to the Nation. Their homes are in Alaska, their hearts are in Alaska. They are endeavoring to bring up and educate their children to become sound American citizens. All that they ask here is fair and equal treatment as compared with other American citizens in similar situations in the several States of the United States.

Some question may arise in your minds as to why, under the figures which I have submitted, the cost of living in the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, is shown as 75 percent higher than in the State of Washington, while at Anchorage, Alaska, the increase in the cost of living over the State of Washington is something around 185 percent. In this matter the geographical location of the two places is important. Ketchikan is the nearest city in Alaska to the State of Washington. Anchorage is situated about 1,200 miles farther to the northwest, and for all practical purposes it can only be reached by a journey inland from the seacoast, a distance of 114 miles over the Alaska Railroad. It is obvious that the cost of transportation of supplies to Anchorage will be much greater than the cost of transportation of the same supplies to Ketchikan. Generally speaking, the farther inland one goes the greater will be the cost of the necessaries of life. Both sets of data which I have submitted to show the relative costs of living in Seattle, Wash., and in Anchorage and in Ketchikan are, I believe, accurate and reliable. Do they not prove fully and completely the case presented to you here, through me, of the Federal employees of the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I am going to tell the truth about this bill and about the general proposition of expenditures of the Government. I am going to do this because I feel it is the duty of a Member of Congress at this time to offer any constructive suggestion he has with reference to the situation that our country is facing.

Frankly, I believe I am entitled to make that position clear; I believe I am entitled to tell that story, because a year ago when the economy bill was before the House I gave it all that I had; and, later on, when the administration threw over the economy bill with a program of extravagance such as the world has never seen I opposed that with all my ability; and I have not changed my position at this time.

I am willing to have the President go along and reduce the salaries of the Government employees 10 percent in the coming year. I am willing to do this, not because I begrudge the employees this 10 percent but because I believe that the conditions of our people back home are such that they cannot afford to be burdened with the big taxes that are necessary to support the Government.

I am not willing to save $343,000,000 out of the veterans of this country, which is what that bill did, and $175,000,000 or $180,000,000 out of the employees of this Government, in order to support an extravagant program, one which is going to run us into a deficit of anywhere from $7,000,000,000 to $12,000,000,000 for this fiscal year, one which is going to increase our bonded indebtedness by July 1 to at least $33,000,000,000. And, just let me tell you this: The folks have just tasted blood. Money out of the Federal Treasury will flow easier next year than it has this year.

Recovery cannot come as a result of these enormous Federal expenditures. It is just like pouring water into a pump which has not any valve in an attempt to prime it. The water just runs down into the well, and you do not get anywhere. This is the situation we are facing.

I am firmly convinced that unless now we halt this spending program we are going to be faced with a $10,000,000,000 deficit and at least $43,000,000,000 of national debt by the end of the fiscal year 1935.

Frankly, I realize that until the folks back home act after seeing what is going on, no brakes can be put on this, but I shall do what little I can to try to block it.

We are now in the midst of a grand course of experiments. A gentleman who preceded me just a little while ago favored the establishment of a national lottery. Frankly, I do not believe the gentleman has been keeping up to date with what is going on in our Government. I think we are indulging in a national lottery right now, and with loaded dice.

We have the A.A.A., with expenditures here in Washington, according to my best information, of over $7,000,000 a year, with a tremendous number of jobs—a tremendous number of jobs—paying over $5,000 a year. We have the N.R.A., with a $3,700,000 pay roll in the city of Washington. We have the P.W.A., with a tremendous number of buildings and projects from over all the country, which are not needed; and in order to bolster up the Budget and make a showing to the taxpayers on the regular Budget, we have transfers of tremendous amounts from the P.W.A. to the regular appropriations of the Government.

As these bills come before the House, the minority is going to call the attention of the Membership to just what has been done and is being done to their Budget and just how it is worked up.

Then we have the C.W.A., with enormous expenditures, we have the C.C.C., and I am reliably informed that the cost per man of that organization to date is $1,200 as against a comparable cost of $440 for a soldier in the Army. This figure is much more than it ought to cost to take care of a family as a relief proposition. It ought to take care of three families as a relief proposition, and we have got to get where we are doing that sort of thing if we are going to survive and keep our Budget down.

I voted against the rule yesterday, and I want to tell you something about this bill and what it does that is not right and is not fair to the country.

The bill contains paragraph (d), on page 32, which provides that the provisions of the antideficiency law, the law which has been passed to prevent executive departments incurring deficiencies and which has been on the statute books upward of 30 years, according to what I have been able to look up, and which has been held sacred by every Member of the House who has had any idea of preserving the traditions of government and preserving the right of Congress to appropriate money—why, if we let the executive departments incur deficiencies, the result is that they make the appropriations instead of the Congress, and when the executive departments make the appropriations instead of Congress, just then we lose our power and our control over such things.

Now, this is a bad feature of the bill. It is carried only with reference to the employees, but what is the picture that this bill presents?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I suppose my colleague is fully aware of the fact that certain branches of the service have always been so recognized and given the right to incur deficiencies?

Mr. TABER. Some of them have been, but not along the line of salaries.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Then my colleague further understands that the right carried in this bill to incur deficiencies is strictly limited to the amount the President raises salaries on account of increased cost of living.

Mr. TABER. There is no question about that; but I do not like it, and I will tell you another reason why I do not like it before I yield again to the gentleman.

We are going to be in session practically until the 1st of July, and it may be the 1st of August. If there is any situation where the power of Congress could add additional money because of the increase of the cost of living found by the President, he can come to Congress before any deficiency is incurred and get the money. This is absolutely unnecessary. On the 1st of January, if he decides that there should be an increase, he can come in on the 3d of January, when Congress is in session, and get additional money.

Mr. BUCHANAN. How about the first 6 months?

Mr. TABER. That will be covered by the deficiency appropriation before we adjourn.

There is another thing in the bill, on page 30, that I do not like. That is the provision that raises the salaries of Members of Congress from $8,500 to $9,000, followed by giving to the President authority to raise the salary of Members of Congress from $9,000 to $10,000.

I need the increase of salary as much as the rest.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is not seriously claiming that there is any such provision.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman wait until I get through and the gentleman will not dispute it. I do not think we ought to increase our salaries in the situation the country is in today.

Now, if you will turn to pages 15 and 16 of the report, the President is authorized to investigate through the established agencies of the Government the facts relating to the cost of living in the United States during the 6-month period ending June 30, 1928, to be known as the "base period", and upon the basis of such facts and the application thereto of such principles as he may find proper, determine an index figure of the cost of living during such period. The President is further authorized to make a similar investigation and determination of an index figure of the cost of living during the 6-month period ending December 31, 1932, and each 6-month period thereafter.

I do not think there was anything sinister on the part of the Executive in this, because these provisions were not in the language of the Budget estimate, but I believe it is absolutely foreign to independent legislation to permit in any way the Executive to have the right to have anything to do with fixing the salaries of Members of Congress. I do not believe it is right for us to carry the language beginning with the proviso in line 10, page 31. It seems to me to be a violation of a fundamental principle, and I frankly do not like that kind of legislation, and I do not like to be recorded in favor of it.

I am in hopes the majority will come back to the principle that the President enunciated when he came before us last March advocating the balancing of the Budget, and balancing the Budget means balancing it in such a way as to meet expenses without increasing the national debt.

We have a tremendous deficit and it is getting bigger day by day. The Treasury balance has dropped off every day until it is now only seven hundred and forty-eight millions. On December 20, 1933, it was $1,300,000,000, the largest peace-time figure in history.

It seems to me that we should take warning of these things and of these tremendous bond issues that are going to strain the very sources of credit of this Government, that we should cut off and cut down to the point where we can go along and put our house in order. I have tried in this matter as always to present facts to the House for its consideration and to present constructive suggestions. I hope that what I have had to say will arouse in the House, its Membership, and throughout the country something of the necessary spirit which will require this Government to retrench and to stop this wild orgy of extravagance that we have been indulging in for the past year.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. In the first part of the gentleman's speech he said re favored the 10-percent reduction in the pay of Federal employees?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. And that, without regard to the amount of compensation that these Federal employees are drawing from the Government?

Mr. TABER. I do not know that I went into that, to any extent. I do feel that the situation of our people back home is such that we have got to economize. We cannot impose great burdens of taxation upon them.

Mr. HEALEY. Does not the gentleman think that this reduction should be graduated according to the amount of compensation that the officers and employees of the Government are drawing?

Mr. TABER. It probably would be more suitable if limited to those above a minimum figure of six or seven hundred dollars.

Mr. HEALEY. Does the gentleman not think it would be more equitable to graduate the amount of reduction if it be necessary?

Mr. TABER. It probably would, but that seems to be impossible with the situation we are facing as far as I can see. I would not if I could attempt to offer an amendment on that at this time.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. BEITER. Was the gentleman not a Member of Congress in 1929?

Mr. TABER. I was.

Mr. BEITER. Why did not the gentleman at that time present this wonderful constructive idea to the Members of Congress that he has presented here today?

Mr. TABER. I have fought for economy here on this floor for 11 years, and I shall continue to fight for it. I have not had to change my opinion on that question one iota.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take very much time on this bill, but I am constrained to direct a few observations following the remarks of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER]. I, too, like him, am in favor of economically running the Government, but I believe there are times when economy should be lost sight of. I am not one of those when an appeal is made to me on the part of a person in dire want or necessity to refer him to a charitable organization where perhaps it might take days to relieve his distress, while in the meantime he might pass out of this mundane sphere. I do not believe in economy when our citizens are starving. I do not believe in economy when the citizens of our country are not properly housed or clothed. I believe that all rules of economy or otherwise should be thrown to the winds in order that we may give help and succor in the hour of dire necessity. Now let us turn back the pages of the record. The time is short. Only a few months ago, going back to the 4th day of March, we took over this Government which was tottering, with the banks closing—aye, even with the stark figure of revolution threatening our Government. We needed a strong hand. Gentlemen on the other side had had control of this Government for 12 years, and they turned it over to us in a pitiable condition, bankrupt as to statesmanship and bankrupt as to financial resources or management. Gentlemen on that side were delighted to go along with the Democratic President, and why? They had failed miserably, and they would grasp at any straw so that something might be done. They joined hands with our party to uphold the hands of the President and try to do something to alleviate the distress and misery that marched through our land.

Various measures were adopted, legislation was enacted, and we admit that we spent a lot of money. You have got to spend money to do things. We did not consider economy or curtailment of appropriations when the necessity of the hour demanded expenditure. We fed the hungry and clothed and housed them, and we spent a lot of money keeping the distressed farmer on his little farm, giving him a chance to start over again. We do not deny it—we admit it—and we are proud that we have helped keep the farmers of our country on their old homesteads and have given them a chance to try again. We do not deny that we have spent millions of dollars to help the owners of little homes in towns and villages and in the great cities of this country refinance their mortgages, that their homes might not be swept away from them through foreclosure. All these things cost money, and you gentlemen were mighty glad to go along with us in the passage of many of these bills. But now a new picture presents itself. The congressional elections are looming on the horizon, and you say, "Oh, we got to get some issues, we got to get busy, and now, what are we going to get after these fellows on?" Well, they called all the shock troops together and said, "Boys, what are we going to do?" The reply was that the very best line of attack would be to go over after these terrific and gigantic expenditures that have been made, without, however, considering the laudable purposes for which they were made. Very well. We admit making them, but we say that we made them for a worthy cause; that we made them to help the great citizenry of our beloved country; and, thank God, we have been reasonably successful. And now that the boys on the other side see that we have been successful, new hope inspires them, and they say that there is a chance for them after all. They say, "Let us go out and make an issue on this question and see what the elections will bring forth." I think you are making a terrible mistake. Men get up here and talk about the folks back home. Yes; the folks back home know all about it, and especially those who have been helped, and they thank God that this country has a strong hand guiding its destinies in the person of the Democratic President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

However, I did not arise to speak in general, but my attention was attracted by various dissertations that have been set forth here this morning.

I want to go back to the question of Federal pay cuts. The boys are picking up that issue. They think that it is a good one. Let us examine it. Last December, when the subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations gathered in Washington, one of the first committees to get working was the committee which has presented the bill that is now before you. At that time the following proposition was made and agreed to by many of the Federal employees, and that was as follows: That our committee include in the estimates money for the entire 15 percent which has been cut from the salaries, and that we give the President power to restore either all or a part of that 15 percent when the rise in cost of living permitted it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, that was the original proposition. Now what has happened? A better state of affairs will come about if this bill is passed. How and why? To begin with, with the beginning of the fiscal year, 5 percent of the Federal employees' salaries will be restored. In addition to that, the President will have the power to restore all or a part of the remaining 10 percent. So, therefore, the original proposition was that the entire 15 percent be appropriated for, and that its restoration be left in the hands of the President. Now, under the provisions of this bill 5 percent is restored, and the balance, 10 percent, is left in the hands of the President for restoration.

I am sure there has been no greater champion of the Federal employees on the floor of this House than I. During the entire period of my service here I have been solicitous about their welfare and about their salaries. I am sure I would not favor any proposition that would not be helpful to them. I confess I was very much disappointed in the figures submitted by the Department of Labor as to the costs of living, but, however, these figures were compiled by Federal employees in one of our departments of Government.

So, therefore, I hope that with a new survey, perhaps a new condition may be exhibited to us, and the foundation laid for an increase for the Federal employees.

With your permission I should like to say a few words in particular about the bill.

The present independent offices appropriation bill now pending before the House is in the total sum of $566,435,693. This sum is the smallest total carried by this act since the fiscal year 1929. For that year there was appropriated in the regular Independent Offices Act the aggregate amount of $527,593,111. Thereafter, the appropriation totals for these independent activities increased each year by leaps and bounds, reaching the peak in the act for the fiscal year 1932 in the grand sum of $1,052,777,010. The following year brought only a slight recession, the total for 1933 being $982,446,041.

For the fiscal year 1934, President Hoover submitted estimates for the independent offices appropriation bill totaling $1,004,548,301. The bill passed both Houses of Congress and was sent to President Hoover in the total sum of $1,003,314,981, being a reduction of $1,233,320 below the Budget estimates. The bill failed for lack of the President's signature.

In the extra session of the present Congress, after the passage of the National Credit Act, authorizing the President to prescribe the pensions and other benefits to veterans and their dependents and after President Roosevelt had promulgated his regulations thereunder, new estimates were submitted for the independent offices in the total sum of $535,568,883, being a reduction of $468,979,418 under the estimates which had been previously submitted by President Hoover. Of this reduction, $460,000,634 was contributed by the Veterans' Administration, while the remainder, $8,978,784, was taken from all other independent establishments in the bill. The amount of the bill for 1934 as finally approved by the President, exclusive of $48,500 for the International Institute of Agriculture and $13,110 for the enforcement of the black bass law, carried as riders on the bill and not properly chargeable to the independent establishments, was $631,740,936. A supplemental appropriation in the fourth deficiency act of $265,000 for the Federal Trade Commission, together with an appropriation in a special act of $150,000 for the Federal Home Loan Bank Board, makes a gross total of $632,155,936 for the independent establishments for 1934.

Since the foregoing appropriations were made, however, several of the independent establishments have been transferred to other departments, and the appropriations for them are not carried in this year's bill. These activities and the amounts of the 1934 appropriation for the same are as follows:

Transferred to the Department of the Interior:
Arlington Memorial Bridge Commission	$198,000
Commission of Fine Arts	8,800
Federal Board for Vocational Education	2,487,700
George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission	96,650
Mount Rushmore National Memorial Commission	10,000
Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks	3,322,500
Public Buildings Commission	80,000
Transferred to Department of Commerce:
U.S. Shipping Board	310,000
Total	6,513,650

Deducting the amount of the appropriations for the offices transferred, there remains a net total appropriated for 1934 for the activities remaining in this bill of $625,642,286. The total of $566,435,693 carried in the present bill for 1935 is, therefore, a reduction of $59,206,593 under the current appropriations for like activities.

Reverting to the offices transferred to other departments by Executive order under the President's authority to reorganize the Government establishments, it is of interest to note that the total of the appropriations for this group of activities for the fiscal year 1932, when the independent offices bill reached an all-time peak of over a billion dollars, was, exclusive of $35,000,000 for the construction loan fund of the Shipping Board, $12,601,200 as compared with a total of $6,513,650 for 1934. It will thus be seen that this subcommittee, in a period of 3 years' time, cut the appropriations for these activities almost in half before their transfer to and consolidation with other departments.

Of the reduction of $486,341,317 in the present bill below the total of $1,052,777,010 of the 1932 act, $12,601,200 is accounted for by the regular activities of the offices which have since been transferred, $35,000,000 by the appropriation for the construction loan fund of the Shipping Board, $340,856,841 by the reductions in the appropriations for the Veterans' Administration and the remainder, $97,883,276, by the reductions in all the other independent establishments.

The foregoing constitutes a marvelous record in economy and in the reduction of Government expenditures; and this subcommittee may well take a pardonable pride in its contribution to this end.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN] has expired.

Mr. BOYLAN. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that general permission has been granted for extension and revision of remarks?

The CHAIRMAN. General permission has been granted for Members to extend their own remarks.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to discuss an amendment that I propose to offer at the proper time, to restore to the veterans who have war service-connected disability, the full compensation they were receiving prior to the Economy Act and prior to the Executive orders of the President, which reduced the disabled veterans' compensation approximately 25 percent.

Under the vicious rules of the House as adopted yesterday, providing for the consideration of this legislation, all we are able to do is to offer an amendment providing for an increase in a lump sum, without specifying the purpose for which it is to be spent. In order to get a clear-cut proposition before the House I am going to limit my amendment, if I get the opportunity, to merely restoring the compensation of the veterans with war service-connected disabilities. That will amount to approximately $40,000,000. I am waiting for the exact figures from the Veterans' Bureau and from the service organizations.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Does the gentleman propose to take care of the Spanish War veterans at the same time?

Mr. FISH. Another amendment will be offered by Mr. MCGUGIN, of Kansas, if the gentleman is recognized, to take care of the Spanish-American War veterans. I assume another amendment will be offered to take care of the restoration of the hospitalization for the destitute veterans. Possibly other amendments will be offered, but the one that I propose to offer merely has to do with that classification of veterans who have war-service disabilities recognized by the Federal Government.

I want to call the attention both of the Republicans and the Democrats to the fact that when the economy bill was before the House—and I voted for the economy bill, believing that the President would deal honestly, fairly, and humanely with those disabled veterans—not a single Member of the House ever suggested that a penny would be taken away from any disabled war veteran with service-connected disability.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I would like to have the gentleman inform the House, so the RECORD will show clearly, how he or anyone else can offer an amendment to this bill that will take care of a service-connected disability. Can you in any way offer any language as an amendment to this bill, under existing conditions, to put the service-connected veteran back where he was before the Economy Act was passed?

Mr. FISH. No; but I may say to the gentleman that if such amendment as I propose were adopted—and, of course, it would have to be adopted by a majority vote of the House—if that were done and it were put into this bill, of course, the mandate and intention of the House would be carried out by this House and the committees of the House and by the Senate, and that the money that would be provided for in the bill would be spent for that specific purpose either by a rider put on in the Senate or by future legislation in the House. This is a test vote for those who want to restore the compensation of our war-disabled veterans.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is just a gesture, then, and that is all.

Mr. FISH. No; it is no gesture at all. I want to point out that no member of the Economy League, and as far as I know, no citizen of the United States, and certainly no Member of the House, no Democrat on your side, ever suggested taking a penny away from these disabled soldiers with war service-connected disabilities.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. You say no Member on this side suggested, at the time of the debate on the economy bill, that one cent would be taken away from the disabled veterans?

Mr. FISH. No Member advocated it. Some might have been fearful of it, but nobody who supported the economy bill ever suggested it would be taken away if the economy bill was passed. Some Members of the House voted against the economy bill because they were opposed to cutting off the rolls 400,000 non-service-connected cases.

Some of those who opposed the economy bill might have been fearful that the disabled war veterans would be reduced. The answer to it is, as I pointed out, that no single member of the Economy League, which led this fight, ever suggested it; and they have repeatedly said so since the time this compensation was cut.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry but I cannot yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I will get the gentleman some more time.

Mr. FISH. All right, then I will yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I mean I will try to.

Mr. FISH. Then I am sorry, I cannot yield.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to permit me to finish my question?

Mr. FISH. Yes; I will yield briefly for that purpose.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Is it not a fact the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING] pointed out on March 11 what would happen if the economy bill were adopted?

Mr. FISH. There is no question that some of those who opposed the economy bill made such suggestions. But the fact today is that here is an opportunity to get a direct vote on this question. I am convinced that over 90 percent of the American people would like to see this compensation for disabled veterans restored [applause]; people belonging to both parties. I am not including the questionable cases, the presumptive cases, or any cases but that have direct service-connected disability.

If I secure the right to offer an amendment increasing this compensation about $40,000,000, and if it is adopted, it will be a mandate from this House that the compensation for the disabled be restored. No one will take contrary action and no one from the President down will dispute the will of the House.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I have the time to give him now.

Mr. FISH. All right; I gladly yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. I have 1 minute. This is my question: The gentleman seems to be very much interested in the veterans' cause this session. I am wondering why the gentleman did not make this speech and show this interest last session when this measure was pending. The gentleman voted for the economy bill, did he not?

Mr. FISH. I voted for the economy bill because I had confidence in the gentleman's President when he said he would deal humanely, fairly, and honestly with the veterans. He failed to do so, however, so far as the disabled veterans are concerned. I am not speaking of those veterans who were injured after the war. This is a clear-cut test case which I believe most Members of Congress would like to vote in favor of and go on record against any cuts for those veterans disabled during the war.

The gentleman who just interrogated me is a new Member of the House. I happen to be the senior war veteran on the Republican side. I have taken part in all veterans' legislation for the last 12 years or more. After voting for the economy bill and later seeing what the President did to the actual war disabled, I supported and voted for the Cutting-Steiwer amendment to remedy this injustice. My friends from Tammany Hall, who have been arraigning the Republican Party for its failure to provide justly and fairly for the veterans, let me point out that all this veteran legislation in behalf of the disabled veterans was enacted by Republican Congresses under Republican Presidents ever since the World War. It was not until the last Congress, a Democratic Congress came in—at least in the House of Representatives—with a Democratic President, that the work of the Republican Congresses for the last 12 years was undone by actually wiping out the compensation given to disabled soldiers or those veterans with war-connected disabilities.

I do not say I am in favor of the entire Legion program, but I am not addressing myself to that at the present time. All I am saying is that the disabled veterans, the ones to whom we made promises and pledges, have been crucified on a cross of inflation and economy against the wishes, I believe, of the overwhelming majority of this House and of the American people.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield; yes.

Mr. HEALEY. As a veteran in the first session of this Congress the gentleman knew the economy bill proposed to take away approximately $400,000,000 from the appropriation for veterans; and as a veteran the gentleman knew or ought to have known that this amount could not be taken away without affecting the very class of veterans about whom the gentleman now speaks.

Mr. FISH. I will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me a little more time?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. I am not apologizing for voting in favor of the economy bill. I believed the statements contained in the Democratic platform and upheld by their Presidential candidate were made in good faith. I believed the President was sincere when he stood on that platform of economy and a balanced Budget, when he came before the House and said that we must balance the Budget. That was the most important recommendation he made 10 months ago to the Congress of the United States. But as it turned out, the Budget was to be balanced largely at the expense of the veterans. They cut 400,000 veterans off the rolls, veterans who were injured after the war; and no one could make an objection to that; it saved a large sum of money. No one, however, ever proposed to take a penny from those who were actually disabled while they were in war service. This is why we raise the issue now and seek to undo a great wrong to our disabled veterans of the World War and Spanish War.

Ten months ago your President and my President came before Congress and said: "The Budget must be balanced largely at the expense of the veterans"; yet today he sends in a Budget message unbalancing the Budget by $7,000,000,000. Hundreds of thousands of direct service-connected cases have been cut 25 percent and 65,000 Spanish War veterans unable through lapse of time to prove service connection have been dropped from the rolls.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. Correcting the statement made by the gentleman leaving the inference that the economy bill provided for a reduction of $400,000,000 in the case of veterans, is not this the truth: That the economy bill itself speaks for itself and did not specify a single dollar reduction, for that matter, leaving solely in the hands of the President the reorganization of the pensions, and that Congress accepted that bill in the light of the President's statement that he would administer it fairly and justly?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Those of us who voted for the economy bill did so because of our faith in the words of the President himself, and we believed when he said he wanted to balance the Budget and maintain the national credit that he would deal fairly, justly, and humanely with the disabled veterans, which he promised to do. It is not necessary to give a further answer.

Mr. McGUGIN. And the act itself did not specifically take a single penny from the pension benefits. That was left entirely in the hands of the President by request.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman's statement is correct.

It is a travesty, a farce, to now unbalance the Budget by $7,000,000,000 and say we must continue to take away the compensation from those veterans disabled in war service. The Republican Party stands where it has always stood, for a square deal not a new deal for our veterans disabled in war service. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding the fact that the time allotted to me is very limited, I appreciate the opportunity to voice my sentiments by the registration of a vehement protest against the continuation of salary cuts of Government employees, and especially those in the lower grades. I voted against this arbitrary and vicious rule on yesterday for two reasons: First, because the adoption of this iniquitous rule means that we as Representatives have practically abdicated our rights and powers as such to the White House and to the Appropriations Committee; and, second, because by the adoption of this brutal rule we not only hogtie ourselves so far as the pending bill is concerned, but we also manacle ourselves in like manner on future legislation which may be presented at this session of Congress.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the administration subjects itself to a charge of the grossest inconsistency in its insistence that these pay cuts be continued. It is a clear violation of both the letter and the spirit of the N.I.R.A. program of which the administration and our friends on the opposite side of this Chamber so lustily boast. The administration, through the so-called "Blue Eagle", is vigorously not only appealing to private industry, but arbitrarily ordering private industry to increase wages and thus augment the purchasing power of the Nation, and at the same time the same administration is maintaining cuts in the compensation of its poorly paid workers. I repeat, that this is not only an inexplicable inconsistency, but it is a palpable injustice as well.

It is argued that the survey made by the Labor Department as to the increase in the cost of living does not justify the restitution of this 15-percent cut. I do not know where the Labor Department got its data to justify this conclusion. I do know that this conclusion does not conform to my personal observation and experience. I do know that many of the commodities which the average person is forced to buy has advanced from 50 to 100 percent since the advent of the blue eagle. Flour and many other foodstuffs have doubled in price, and cotton goods have advanced from 50 to 100 percent. A pair of overalls that could be bought for 75 cents a year ago is now selling for twice that figure, and other wearing apparel has advanced in proportion.

I am not concerned about my own salary or the salary of other better-paid Government employees. It is that large army of Government workers who are paid moderate salaries and less to whom my heart throbs in sympathy. Government workers who receive as little as $5 per week and less, such as substitute postal employees, are subject to this barbarous cut. I think that common justice demands that this salary cut be restored, and restored now, to all Government workers who receive less than $2,500 per year. The cut might be continued as to the others for the time being.

I was very much delighted to hear my distinguished friend from New York, Representative FISH, announce a moment ago that he would offer an amendment to this bill at the right time in the interest of the ex-service men of the country.

I am sorry, however, that my colleague's amendment does not begin to meet the situation. In fact, I do not think that the Legion's four-point program meets the situation. The condition of the veterans of this country is desperate in the extreme, and it is up to this Congress to do something in a substantial way to redress the grave injustice that has been already done our national heroes. On the first day of the session I introduced a bill to repeal title I of the so-called "Economy Act", which bill provides for the automatic reinstatement of pensions and compensations as of March 20, 1933. I am hoping that this bill may be passed or that some measure of like purport may be enacted before adjournment of this session of Congress.

When the so-called "economy bill" was up at the last session, in soft, seductive terms we were assured by those sponsoring the measure that no injustice was intended to the disabled veterans, their widows, and dependents. Many well-disposed Members of Congress were deceived by this subtle and pious assurance; but I am happy to say that your humble servant was not numbered among the gullibles on that occasion. Amidst crocodile tears, they protested their great love and solicitude for the ex-service man, his widow, and orphan children, while the altar was being prepared for their sacrifice and immolation. It was simply a repetition of the old story of Bible days. It is recorded in Second Samuel that Joab met Amasa in the Palestine desert, and as Joab approached Amasa, as was the custom of that country in those days, he seized him by the beard and administered unto him a large, luscious kiss, saying in plaintive accents, "Art thou in health, my brother?" And at the same time he plunged his dagger into Amasa's fifth rib and shed his bowels to the earth. In like manner did the sponsors of this legislation approach the disabled veteran, saying: "We will do thee no harm, my brother"; but lo! he was crucified in the name of economy, and the money that had been paid him was diverted and parceled out to divers and sundry devices.

Yes; we were led to believe that this cut in the salaries of Government employees and the veterans was necessary and imperative economy, but we were soon disillusioned when the Government embarked upon an orgy of extravagant expenditures hitherto unknown in this or any other country. The sham and subterfuge was soon exposed, when the money that had been paid the Government workers and veterans, along with millions and billions of other money, was diverted into other channels, in many instances much less worthy. How the Government can expect to accomplish recovery by this sort of "rob Peter to pay Paul" hocus-pocus, I am unable to understand.

In addition to taking the stipend from our soldiers, the Government has inflicted upon him an additional hardship and discrimination. I have had hundreds of letters from ex-service men in my district and elsewhere, some of them drawing the insignificant pittance of $6 per month, who, on account of this paltry allowance, are denied work by the great C.W.A. At the last session of Congress I made several attempts to have a preference granted to those who wore our country's uniform in our public-works program, but my efforts were futile and in vain.

In conclusion, I want to call to the attention of the House the words of the immortal Washington uttered just 150 years ago, in 1783, as follows:

> In what part of the continent shall we find any man or body of men who would not blush to stand up and propose measures purposely calculated to rob the soldier of his stipend? And were it possible that such a flagrant instance of injustice could ever happen, would it not excite the general indignation and tend to bring down upon the author of such a measure the aggravated vengeance of heaven?

In his second address, President Lincoln gave expression to a similar lofty sentiment.

Alas, my colleagues, how far have we departed from the sound and patriotic stand and advice of these illustrious Americans! [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I spent practically one half of my time during this past summer in veterans' hospitals fighting cases for them and trying to help these veterans and representing them in their controversies. I know the condition and the situation of these veterans, and I believe that this Congress should right some of the wrongs that were done at the last session. This is the only time we have to do it.

I do not know why we should be handicapped here by being refused the opportunity of making proper amendments and discussing this matter as fully as it probably should be discussed, not only alone with regard to the veterans but our Federal employees who, in many instances, are laboring under handicaps that are almost insurmountable insofar as pay cuts are concerned. Particularly is this prevalent among the special-delivery carriers and various other substitutes in the Post Office Department. It is almost unbelievable what those boys are up against.

We are asking industry to raise pay under the N.R.A.; we are asking everybody to adopt shorter hours and put on more men, and here is the Government itself cutting down on its employees, when we are asking private industry to go ahead and take the other course. I do not think it is fair. I do not think we are consistent when we advocate and carry out such a policy as that. As a matter of fact, these Federal employees have never received an overabundance of pay, and I do not think it is fair to go on in this way.

As far as the N.R.A. in our part of the country is concerned, about the only result we have noticed is that a farmer or a workingman get can a pretty good pair of 50-cent overalls for $1.50. That is all it has accomplished; that is, to raise the cost of living.

The cost of living has gone up. Our farmers are in a more destitute condition now than they have ever been before. Our industries are not gaining as they should. Business is practically at a standstill. The people are still further losing their buying power, and the Congress of the United States will further decrease buying power of its employees and delay the return of prosperity.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that we have not yet had the benefit of the presentation of this bill in detail by the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. It is always a pleasure to hear the gentleman present this bill to this committee. I understand he plans to do that subsequently. I take this opportunity, as a member of the subcommittee of which he is chairman, to pay my tribute to his capacity, his industry, and his fairness as a presiding officer.

I realize that there is a disposition on the part of the majority to expedite the consideration of this bill. For that reason I shall endeavor to make my remarks briefer than they otherwise might be. I want, however, to refer to a few specific items embodied in this bill. I want also to stress two or three considerations of a general nature, which it seems to me the House should have in mind not only in respect to this bill but in respect to those that are to follow. I also want to say a very brief word in regard to the legislative provisions which have been embodied in this bill as a result of the rule which the House saw fit to adopt yesterday.

The members of the committee will note that the report on the bill includes 20 separate independent offices. There are, of course, many other organizations, apparently classified by the Budget as "independent establishments", which have not come before the committee at this time for additional appropriations.

The report indicates that the total carried in the bill amounts to $566,435,693, or a reduction, as compared with last year's bill, of about $59,000,000. I think it is fair to point out in this connection, however, that the reduction to the extent of $3,647,803 results from the inclusion in the bill of three so-called "nonrecurrent items"; that is to say, organizations which were included in last year's bill which have not come before the committee at this time, and which probably will not come before this committee or any other committee for further appropriations.

I think it is also fair to point out that the apparent saving of $129,000 in respect to the American Battle Monuments Commission may prove to be an increase rather than a saving, by reason of the sums required by that organization to meet its commitments payable in francs as a result of the depreciation of the dollar.

If we leave these four items out of the picture the Members will observe that there is an increase in appropriation in respect to each office included in this bill, with the exception, of course, of the Veterans' Administration, the reason for this increase being, in large measure, the provision for salaries on a 90-percent basis rather than on the 85-percent basis in force in the present fiscal year under the provisions of the Economy Act.

Just a word more as to the American Battle Monuments Commission, which expects to conclude its work during the next fiscal year. The Members will note that there is no additional appropriation carried for that organization in this bill. There is, however, a change in language requested which will permit that Commission to obtain such sums as may now be due or may subsequently become due to offset the depreciation in the American dollar under the currency policy of the administration. The estimate submitted to the committee, on the basis of about 12½ francs to the dollar, the then existing rate of exchange, amounted to $175,000. I suspect this will prove to be the forerunner of other very much more substantial requests from the several divisions of our Foreign Service.

I am not going into detail in respect to the various organizations included in this bill. The work of many of them is intensely interesting, and I commend to the particular consideration of the Members of the House the evidence submitted by the Board of Tax Appeals, by the Federal Trade Commission, by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by the Tariff Commission, with especial reference to new duties assumed by some or all of them.

Just a word in regard to the appropriation for the Veterans' Administration. This appropriation and the testimony in connection with it are, of course, of outstanding importance in this bill.

The total carried, if we exclude the sum necessary for the civil-service retirement and disability fund, for the fiscal year 1935, amounts to $525,155,891, a decrease as compared with the present fiscal year of $56,832,109, and as compared with the previous fiscal year of $402,794,527.

The Members will find a very detailed statement in the hearings submitted by General Hines covering each and every item in this appropriation. The hearings also include tables showing its breakdown.

The chief reduction is to be found, of course, in the item entitled "Pensions", an item which this year includes appropriations designated in previous years as military and naval compensation and Army and Navy pensions.

This item amounts to $284,789,984, a decrease in respect of the present fiscal year of $34,440,016, and in respect to the fiscal year 1933, according to General Hines, of $265,290,705. I may add in this connection that the reduction to the extent of $7,204,200 represents the continued cut to the extent of 10 percent in respect to pensions of pre-Spanish War veterans and their dependents.

This reduction is, of course, on the basis of regulations issued under the Economy Act. Various modifications have been made in the drastic regulations which were issued in the first instance under this act. Further modifications are imperative, in my judgment, if they are not to work permanent injustice. I have not changed the opinion evidenced by votes cast at the conclusion of the last session. In my judgment, veterans of the Spanish War and service-connected World War veterans have both been accorded treatment which the country never contemplated.

I am told that changes in existing regulations are now under consideration by the President. I am told that our legislative committee plans prompt action with a view to recommendations to the President. I hope sincerely that proper modifications will become realities in the near future.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. THOM. What is the difference in the appropriations for pensions of the Spanish War veterans under this bill as compared with such pensions under the old regulations?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. With the gentleman's permission, I will insert the figures in the RECORD.

[Testimony submitted to committee indicated obligations as follows: 1933 (actual), $125,355,083; 1934 (estimated), $51,150,071; 1935 (estimated), $45,299,731.]

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BIERMANN. The gentleman said something about correcting the injustices to disabled veterans of the World War, and, of course, everyone wants the disabled veterans of the World War to be treated properly; but up to date, so far as I have listened to the debate, all the suggestions have been in general terms. What specific changes does the gentleman suggest be made in the administration of the Economy Act as it affects the veterans with service-connected disabilities from the World War?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I have not time to go into detail. I believe, however, that the World War service-connected cases have been slashed as never anticipated. I believe that action should be corrected at the earliest opportunity. I believe it should be corrected by changes in existing regulations by the President. Should this prove out of the question, then I think it should be taken care of by Congress.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. FORD. In the judgment of the gentleman would the $20,000,000 that the gentleman from New York mentioned as an addition to the appropriation for the service-connected disabled veterans be sufficient? The gentleman is a member of the committee and ought to have some idea about that.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am unable to state specifically what sum would be requested in that connection. I understood my colleague from New York to say that he had obtained the figure from the Veterans' Administration during the course of the morning.

Now, gentlemen, I want to take up two or three general considerations which seem to me of importance, as I have said, not only in connection with this bill, but, presumably in connection with every other appropriation bill which is going to come before the House.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I yield.

Mr. MAY. In what amount is the whole sum appropriated by this bill for the veterans to be augmented in order to meet the requirements necessary to correct some of the abuses that many of the Members feel have been done to the veterans, or approximately what amount?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am sorry that I cannot give a specific answer to the question. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] gave certain figures in that respect in the course of his remarks. Whether they cover the questions that the gentleman from Kentucky has in mind I am not certain.

Now, gentlemen, during the past year a great deal has been said about balancing that portion of the National Budget that is said to cover ordinary expenditures. We have been told that if that portion of the Budget was brought into balance the extent of extraordinary expenditure was not a vital matter.

I have never subscribed to that principle. I do not subscribe to it now. I think the recent experience of other nations emphasizes clearly the tremendous dangers that it involves. Nevertheless, I think that if we are going to have an ordinary Budget, an extraordinary Budget, or any other form of Budget, the country is entitled to as accurate a picture as possible of what the expenditure in each category is likely to amount to. And I submit that there are tendencies in connection with this bill which, if carried far enough, can render the figures submitted in a large measure meaningless.

In the first place, little or no account has been taken in submitting figures of the general increase in price levels. Acting under blanket instructions from the Bureau of the Budget to remain within the appropriations for last year, item after item in request after request by organization after organization is identical with the item included in last year's appropriation bill. In fact, if we except the Veterans' Administration, the entire bill, aside from salary increase, is largely a reenactment of last year's appropriations.

I do not know what increase would have been necessary if we had taken into account the increase in the cost of those commodities which the several organizations included in the bill are called upon to purchase, but I am confident that the increase would have been very substantial. I am advised that in connection with another appropriation bill testimony has been given that an increase of from thirteen to fifteen million dollars would be required for a single department. Striking testimony in this connection offered by General Hines was yesterday inserted in the RECORD by my colleague from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS]. Increasing prices are not reflected in the figures which have been submitted.

Now there is another consideration of a general character which I wanted to emphasize. For the reason just referred to—the blanket instructions from the Budget Bureau—little or no account has been taken of the tremendous increase in work for some of the offices provided for in this bill.

Take the General Accounting Office. Testimony before the committee indicated that in normal years this office normally handles about 31,000,000 checks for the entire Government. Under existing conditions it is confronted by the probable necessity of handling between December 1 and March 1, for the Civil Works Administration alone, no less than 50,000,000 checks. It is true that the office has received a substantial appropriation from the Public Works Administration amounting to $506,000, but that sum is available only to audit accounts of those organizations receiving funds from the $3,300,000,000 appropriation carried in the National Recovery Act. Of course, there are many other newly created agencies which must submit to audit by the General Accounting Office. If there was any doubt on that point I am glad to say it seems to have been dispelled by recent Executive order. The added burden placed upon this office is tremendous.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Does the gentleman think the General Accounting Office will have enough money to take care of all the auditing required now by that Executive order?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. When the Accounting Office came before our committee there seemed to be some doubt as to whether or not all these newly created agencies would in fact have to submit to audit of their accounts by that office. That doubt having been removed, it seems to me very probable that that office will have to call for a substantial deficiency appropriation.

Mr. BACON. Of course, I am very much pleased that all of these Government agencies have now got to be audited by the General Accounting Office. As I understand it, various organizations, such as the Home Loan Bank Corporation, have refused to submit their accounts to the General Accounting Office, and at the time that Mr. McCarl or his representatives came before the committee, the present Executive order, which was an excellent thing, and to which the gentleman refers had not then been issued. I am fearful that, in order to adequately handle the enormous accounts of all the extra governmental activities now taking place, the General Accounting Office will have to have a great deal more money than is carried for that office in this bill.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I think the gentleman is probably correct.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes; I am glad to yield to the chairman.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will recall that the General Accounting Office received $506,000 from the National Recovery Administration.

Mr. BACON. I recall that; but that was before the Executive order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Undoubtedly they will have to have additional money to carry out this new order.

Mr. BACON. I think the cheapest money that we can possibly spend is to give it to the General Accounting Office to keep down extravagance.

Mr. WOODRUM. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, if we look at the Employees' Compensation Commission we also find a substantial increase in work in prospect. Members of the committee will recall a proposal made on the floor of the House at the time the Civilian Conservation Corps was under consideration, which, if adopted, would have served to eliminate that corps from the benefits of the Compensation Act. That recommendation was not adopted, and today we find no less than 315,000 members of the C.C.C., each of whom is entitled to a life pension at a rate I believe of something like $42 a month in the event of permanent disability, each of whom is entitled to a pension for his dependents in the event of death. The testimony before our committee indicated as of December 2 that there had been no less than 2,708 injuries in this corps, 234 of them proving fatal; both figures being subject to the possibility that some of the cases may prove not to have been service connected.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I am glad to yield to my colleague from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I had a letter from the Commission yesterday in which it says that 275 of the cases reported were fatal, which I think is nearly twice as many deaths as in any other branch of the Government, and that a total of 3,249 cases of injury have been reported from the C.C.C. up to December 22, 1933. As you know, a great many cases are now hospitalized in our Government hospitals also.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I thank my colleague for the more up-to-date information than was presented to the committee.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. REED of New York. When the first Budget message came up to the Committee on Appropriations, did that recommend a full restoration of the salaries and veterans' pay, or is the gentleman in a position to say?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The gentleman is referring to the preliminary figures?

Mr. REED of New York. Yes; the first preliminary figures sent up.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I do not wish to disclose anything that may be considered confidential.

Mr. REED of New York. I shall not press the question.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. But I have no doubt in my own mind that the original plan contemplated including compensation on the basis of 100 percent, on the supposition that Congress would be requested to authorize the President to reduce the total to the maximum of 10 percent if it seemed necessary in his judgment, in the interest of the national welfare.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any secret about it. It has been carried in all of the newspapers in the country that the original figures that did come up had full restoration of the 15 percent.

Mr. REED of New York. Who was responsible for the change being made—the members of the Committee on Appropriations or the President?

Mr. GOSS. In my opinion it was the Budget Bureau.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. It should be borne in mind that the authentic Budget, which is the message of the President, never comes to Congress until it is officially delivered here and read from the Clerk's desk. Everything else that comes is tentative and frequently is changed. As my colleague has said, there is no secret about the fact that it was stated in the newspapers that the tentative figures that came up on which the Committee began hearings early in December did contain full salary restoration.

Mr. GOSS. There must have been a very sharp turn of events to have the cost of living go down some 10 percent in a few days, so that the official recommendation came up as it did.

Mr. REED of New York. I am curious to know the source of the change in the figures, whether it came from the House of Representatives or the executive department.

Mr. WOODRUM. It should be said in fairness that the tentative Budget figures of full salary restoration were accompanied by the fact that it would be the intention of the President to ask Congress to make as much as 10 percent reduction if the cost of living justified it. So the whole thing is about the same.

Mr. REED of New York. The whole thing is a sort of see-saw back and forth, but I am trying to find out who was responsible for it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] 5 additional minutes.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I thank the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to consume all the time myself and I would appreciate it if I may proceed for a few moments without interruption.

I want to say that if my information is correct the Tennessee Valley Authority and other newly created organizations have been placed in a position where they are eligible to the benefits of the Compensation Act. It is obvious there is involved a tremendous potential liability on the part of the Government, and that there will be a great increase in the work of the Commission.

If the Members will consider the testimony offered on behalf of the Federal Trade Commission and will note the new duties it has been called upon to assume in connection with the Securities Act and work of enforcement character which is just beginning under the N.R.A. and the A.A.A.; if they will consider the testimony submitted by the Tariff Commission and see the new duties it has been called upon to assume; if they will consider other testimony embodied in the hearings, I think they will come to the conclusion that there is a great potential increase in work for organization included in this bill, of which little or no account has been taken.

On further general observation, a study of the record will indicate to the Members that the organizations in this bill have received from the Public Works Administration sums amounting to over $3,000,000. Of that figure $2,500,000 will be spent during the present fiscal year. All this money is in addition to money made available in the last appropriation bill and must be considered in connection with that bill.

The list includes $6,000 to the White House for repairs to coping around the building, for repairing loose stone, and for repointing and re-covering sandstone lintels; $400,000 to the Federal Power Commission for national water and electrical energy surveys and for the consideration of loan applications for public works; $506,000 to the General Accounting Office for purposes already specified; $247,900 to the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics; $47,900 for repairs for damage by storm at Langley Field and the balance for such work as construction, grading, moving of pipe lines; and $1,865,000 to the Veterans' Administration for such work as construction, repairs, alterations. In addition it may be mentioned that the Smithsonian Institution has received about 130 workers from the Civil Works Administration said to be occupied with arrearages in work, cataloging, numbering of specimens, translating and renovating, and as painters, carpenters, and electricians in respect to work which the Institution was unable to do with its regular funds.

While much of the work done with these funds is, in my judgment, properly classified as emergency work, a part of the expenditure seems to me to fall clearly under the heading of ordinary expenditure. I am told that in other bills money has been made available in this manner for application to projects which have been specifically disapproved by Congress.

Whether or not this be true, I am sure that the dangers of two appropriating bodies in any Government are self-evident. Carried to the extreme, appropriation by an emergency organization can render absolutely meaningless figures submitted in any legislative appropriation bill. Carried to the extreme, it can reduce so-called "ordinary expenditure" until it entirely disappears, and can deprive Congress of all control over the details of expenditure. I hope sincerely in any emergency appropriation to be made hereafter Congress will see to it that this matter is effectively controlled.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a word in conclusion in respect to the legislative provisions which now have been embodied in this bill. A brief word only, in view of the discussion yesterday, in view of the action taken by the House in adopting the rule. Without taking time to discuss the details of all the provisions, I desire to record myself as opposed to those provisions which refer to compensation for Federal officers and employees and those accorded similar treatment in this bill.

These provisions authorize the incurring of deficiencies by each and every department, by each and every independent establishment, by the municipal government of the District of Columbia—a blanket authorization to incur deficiencies upon the written order of the President.

For upward of 30 years at least we have had upon our statute books the so-called "antideficiency acts", providing specifically and under severe penalty that no executive department or other Government establishment shall expend in any fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that year.

I am told by those of long experience that this House has always jealously guarded its rights under those acts; that chairman after chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in this House has taken the floor to preserve those rights. The proposal flies directly in the face of these acts. It recommends, in my judgment, a departure from established legislative procedure, which is unsound, unwise, and utterly unnecessary.

The provisions also serve to delegate the authority of Congress to appropriate, to the executive branch of the Government. I am opposed to this delegation. As has been brought out in the course of this discussion, the original plans of the Bureau of the Budget called for compensation on the basis of 100 percent, in the expectation that Congress would be requested to authorize the President to reduce that compensation to the extent of 10 percent if in his wisdom he should deem that action essential, in the national interest. For some reason which has not been explained, those plans have been changed. Despite the White House conference with the majority leadership referred to on the floor, that change is now adhered to. I am opposed to that change. I believe that Congress should assume its proper responsibility in this connection.

The officers and employees of the Federal Government throughout the Nation have been subjected to a 15-percent slash in compensation, but that is not all. They have been subjected also to compulsory furloughs, they have been denied other benefits which they had a right to anticipate, and, in addition, they have seen the currency in which they are paid subjected to deliberate depreciation under the announced policy of the administration to restore the 1926 price levels.

When the cut was imposed it was understood that in the event of an increase in cost of living the cut would be reduced. Since that time the entire weight of the administration has been thrown, on the one hand, behind a general increase in price level, and on the other hand behind the maintenance of or increase in the purchasing power of those outside the Federal service. Despite any surveys of the cost of living on a 1928 basis, I think no one will deny that wholesale prices, particularly those referring to clothing and to food, have increased substantially all along the line during the present fiscal year. The price level prevailing in 1926 was higher than that prevailing in 1928. No human being can predict with any degree of accuracy what the price level will prove to be during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, in respect to which we are now called upon to appropriate.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that Congress should assume its proper responsibility in the matter of appropriations. I believe it should preserve the integrity of the antideficiency acts. I can see no objection to making full compensation available in accordance with the original request of the Bureau of the Budget, in view of the fact that under the rule adopted yesterday the President is specifically authorized to reduce that compensation to the extent of 10 percent if in his judgment it is essential to do so in the interest of the national welfare. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

VETERANS' BENEFITS

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, since this bill involves appropriations for the Veterans' Administration, I want to say a few words about what I think should occur at this session of Congress in regard to veterans' benefits. There are many inequalities and injustices that should be ironed out. There are many wrongs that should be righted. The gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. RANKIN, Chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, of which I am a member, has announced that there will be public hearings on all bills which have been introduced involving veterans' benefits, including the American Legion's four-point program. These hearings will commence in a very short time. He announced at the same time that each Member of Congress was invited to appear before the committee and give his views. All recognized veterans' organizations are also invited to have their representatives appear. I join the gentleman from Mississippi in hoping that Members will take advantage of this opportunity, and I also hope that the veterans' representatives will give us the benefit of their views and suggestions.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I will yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I wondered if he could tell us if there was any expectation that any such legislation would be allowed to be brought out?

WRONGS AND INJUSTICES

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly legislation will be allowed to be brought out. I feel reasonably sure that the committee will agree upon a bill that will be presented to this House and passed.

One matter that needs attention is the service-connected cases, the cases of men who received injuries in battle, men who were drawing $90 and $100 a month, but whose compensation has been reduced to about $6 where they are in a hospital. Something ought to be done about it. The amount is too small.

The gentleman from Virginia, the distinguished chairman of this subcommittee, called my attention to the fact that he was getting many complaints from over the country about the reduction to $6 a month for service-connected disabilities of veterans who were receiving more than $50 a month in the employment of the Government. I believe this amount of $6 is too small in most cases.

Mr. WOODRUM. Where they were in the employ of the Government and getting a salary larger than $50 a month?

Mr. PATMAN. Where they were in the employ of the Government. It does not affect private employment.

WIDOWS OF VETERANS

There are many other inequalities. There is the case of the widows of veterans of the World War. The World War widow whose husband died of a disability in no way connected with the service does not draw anything, neither compensation nor pension; yet a Spanish-American War widow whose husband died of a non-service-connected disability gets $15 a month; and the widow of a Civil War veteran whose husband died of a non-service-connected disability gets $40 a month, and more depending on certain conditions.

UNIFORM PENSION LAW

There should be a uniform pension law for both veterans and dependents. The World War veteran 55 years of age who is substantially disabled and in need cannot draw any pension under present laws and regulations for a non-service-connected disability. There is no way for him to draw a pension for a partial disability; yet a Spanish-American War veteran of the same age will draw a minimum of $15 a month for a similar disability. The Spanish-American War veterans should have their pension increased and World War veterans under same conditions should have equal benefits.

REPEAL ECONOMY ACT NOT RIGHT WAY

There is need for a full and complete hearing on the question of veterans' benefits for the purpose of righting these wrongs in a revision of veterans' laws. We should go into the question fully and thoroughly and bring out a bill to correct the inequalities and injustices which exist, and there are many of them. Some of our friends who are enthusiastic in the interests of veterans say we should repeal the Economy Act outright, that this would be the best way to do it. As one who voted against the Economy Act, as one who made a speech on the floor of this House against the Economy Act, I do not believe this would be the best way to help the veterans under present circumstances.

DISABLED EMERGENCY OFFICERS

If you were to repeal the Economy Act outright—I am talking solely of veterans now—you would place back into the hands of the enemies of the veterans the same weapons with which to slay them that they had before the passage of the Economy Act. If you were to repeal the Economy Act outright, you would place back on the pension roll more than 4,500 disabled emergency officers. There is considerable sentiment, even among the veterans, against this group of disabled emergency officers drawing the large amounts they drew before the passage of the Economy Act.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. I do not claim that what I am about to say affects every one of the 4,500; I will say they are exceptions, but it affects some of them. A large number of these officers were distinguished soldiers with distinguished records. It was shown that a few of them served in the Military Establishment here in Washington only 2 or 3 weeks before the Armistice was signed; the William Wolf Smith case is an example. They had been drawing $200 or $300 a month as retired emergency officers because they had what was known as a 30 percent permanent disability; yet the enlisted man who in battle suffered a 30 percent disability could receive a maximum of only $30 a month. So many people do not believe you should put these 4,500 disabled emergency officers back on the pension list, regardless of where they served or how they received their disabilities, but believe they should receive the same pay for the same disability as their enlisted men comrades receive who also were emergency soldiers; if you repeal the Economy Act you will immediately restore them, and these exceptional cases I have told you about will again be shown up to the public as an example. Three of these officers, the reports show, were drawing $20 a month for disability until the Retired Emergency Officers' Act passed, which caused them to be increased to $416.66 a month each for the same disabilities.

AFTER-WAR CASES

Furthermore, there were a lot of veterans who did not enlist until after the war was over, yet these veterans have been drawing battle-casualty pay for disabilities in no way connected with war-time service. They have been drawing the same rate of compensation as the man who was injured upon the field of battle. Many people do not believe they should draw such compensation. If you were to repeal the Economy Act outright, you would immediately restore them to battle-casualty pay upon the pension rolls of this country.

WILLFUL MISCONDUCT

There are many veterans who have been suffering from what is known as willful misconduct disabilities; they are called willful misconduct cases. There are lots of people who do not believe that men who suffered as a result of their own willful misconduct, conduct in no way connected with military service, or war-time service, should draw the same amount of compensation as the man who suffered injury upon the field of battle or received any compensation at all for such a disability. If you repeal the Economy Act, you will immediately restore and place back upon the pension rolls this particular group.

RICH VETERANS

Furthermore, there are many rich veterans in this country, men who have plenty of property, men who have a large annual income, who have been drawing a pension from the Government monthly for non-service-connected disabilities. If you repeal the Economy Act you will place this class of men back on the pension rolls and cause them to receive a good-sized pension, which they do not need, for a disability in no way connected with military service.

HOSPITALIZE RICH VETERANS

Furthermore, you will put back in the Government hospitals a group of veterans who do not need Government hospitalization, men who are able to provide for themselves in their own local hospitals in their own home towns. You will put them back in the Government hospitals at an expense of $120 a month to the Government for disabilities in no way connected with their military service.

RESTORE ALL MERITORIOUS AND DESERVING CASES

An outright repeal of the Economy Act insofar as it affects veterans is not the right way to help the veterans. We should try to restore to their former status all meritorious and deserving cases and leave off all undeserving and unmeritorious cases. We should certainly liberalize hospitalization laws and regulations in the interest of veterans. We should endeavor to give a pension status to deserving border-line cases that are hampered in their efforts to prove service connection by loss of hospital records, death of doctors, comrades, and for other equally just reasons. We should help the deserving instead of working to put back on the pension rolls the 4,500 retired emergency officers, the after-war cases, the willful-misconduct cases, and the rich veterans for pension and hospitalization purposes. All these groups endorse the slogan "Repeal the Economy Act", knowing they will have all their former benefits restored if it is repealed and would stand very little chance to get them restored in any other way.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

I sincerely hope the adjusted-service certificates can be paid in full this session of Congress. Such payment will not only pay an honest debt, justly due, but will also expand the currency by placing buying power into the hands of nearly 4,000,000 veterans who reside in every nook and corner of the Nation. We are endeavoring to get the administration to adopt this plan of relief.

PURGE PENSION ROLLS

I join with you in the hope that the pension rolls of this country can be purged of all unmeritorious and undeserving cases, because these undeserving cases in your respective districts are calculated to be injurious to the benefit of the deserving veterans. Therefore, we should be very careful that none of these undeserving or unmeritorious cases remain on the pension roll if we can prevent it, but make sure that all deserving and meritorious cases do remain on or be restored to the pension roll.

Mr. MOTT. Would it not be entirely feasible, in the gentleman's opinion, to repeal the Economy Act and then make such corrections as the gentleman has suggested? But first repeal the act.

Mr. PATMAN. Then the old bunch would see all of these abuses and say, "Let us pass another Economy Act." We would be repealing and restoring. We would keep the undeserving on the same basis and status as the deserving in that way. Let us put all the deserving ones back on and leave the undeserving ones off. Why give our enemies the weapons to slay us with that they had before the Economy Act was passed?

Mr. MOTT. I mean to have all of these corrections in one act and then bring the act in altogether. Provide first for the repeal of the Economy Act; then correct all of the alleged injustices.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I noticed in the press some time ago a ruling had been made by Comptroller General McCarl restoring a certain class to the pension rolls, amounting to a great many million dollars. I believe this was in the case of the so-called "emergency officers." Does the gentleman have any information he can give to the House as to what class is included in those restored?

Mr. PATMAN. About 1,500 out of 6,000 remain on the pension rolls and most of them were battle casualties and although I am not in favor of the principle I do not expect to object to these 1,500 drawing such benefits if no effort is made to bring in a larger number.

Mr. JAMES. Does the gentleman know of his own knowledge of any misconduct case you ever handled where the individual received compensation?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes. There are lots of cases in the files. You can find them.

Mr. JAMES. I asked the one who had charge of the the veterans' bureau in Michigan about such cases and he stated that there was not a single such case acted upon by the Michigan bureau in which they granted relief.

Mr. PATMAN. I do not have reference to that particular bureau. However, I am sure the gentleman is mistaken. When I refer to misconduct cases, I refer particularly to venereal cases.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 9 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss].

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, before I address myself to the section of the bill in reference to salary cuts, I want to say, as one of the members of the minority, that I greatly appreciate the courtesies shown at all times during the hearing in the committee by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], chairman of the subcommittee, and his colleagues on the other side. We were shown every courtesy possible and matters went along very smoothly in committee.

We have come down to the point of trying to discuss what the situation in this bill is today. I took the attitude yesterday, in the few minutes allotted to me, of trying to explain that the cost of living had gone up more than 5 percent. I put a letter in the RECORD from General Hines himself stating he was paying at least 25 percent more for materials. I did not have time to complete my argument at that time, but I say that if the emergency recovery measures are so foredoomed to failure that only a 5-percent restoration of Government employees' pay would be justifiable by next July, then there is no justification for going ahead with the large expenditures that will involve a deficit of $7,000,000,000. I think it is only fair to say, and I voted for those programs, that they have accomplished some good. We know that they were originated to raise the level of comomdity prices. We know we have spent millions, if not billions, of dollars already in doing that. Now, is the Democratic Party ready to say to us today that that program is foredoomed to failure? I do not think so. Then, gentlemen, if they are not, there is only one other answer to the matter, and that is that the cost of living has gone up more than 5 percent. There are the facts.

What can we do about it in this very bill before us? I will tell you what you can do. After this bill has been read under the 5-minute rule the minority will offer a motion to recommit the bill. They may even offer that motion with instructions. Let us say that that motion will be ruled out by the Chairman on a point of order, under the special rule. Then, if no one else does so, I will, as a minority member of the committee, offer a simple motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on Appropriations, and, gentlemen, there is no question that motion is in order. You will be given an opportunity to vote on that question. If you believe, as I do, that all this money that we have spent in raising these commodity prices under this recovery program has been helpful, then we must admit that those billions, as I said before, and I want to hammer it in, have raised the cost of living. I contend it has raised the cost of living beyond the 5 percent contained in this bill.

I am willing to congratulate the President on the fact that commodity prices have been raised, and, as a Republican, I want to say to you that I am willing to give you credit for raising them more than the restoration of pay cut to these Federal employees. Those are the facts. That is all there is to it.

We cannot reach the veterans' benefits in this bill. We have a permanent law that prohibits that. We are told by the administration leaders, however, that we will have legislation on that question later. That is all there is to this bill, other than supply items for the independent offices which are pretty much the same every year, and may I say they are approximately the same amounts this year that they were last year, with one exception—that is, a $10,000 raise in printing and binding for one of the departments. So when we come down to it, all there is before us is title II of this bill.

I want to ask you again, right on your own program, are you going to tell the country that after spending over $7,000,000,000 this has failed to raise commodity prices? No. Well, then, we must admit that the cost of living has come up sufficiently to restore this 15-percent pay cut. Does any gentleman here see anything wrong with that argument? If he does, I would like to debate it with him for a few minutes. Is what I said here sound? I do not see anyone rising to say that it is not.

Then the simple thing for you to do is to support the motion to recommit this bill to the Appropriations Committee. Let them bring the bill out as your own administration sent it to us originally in the tentative Budget, with the 15 percent restored.

The principal grounds for opposing the extension, during the fiscal year of 1935, of the President's authority to adjust Federal salaries on the 1928 base described in the Economy Act to a maximum reduction of 10 percent may be summarized as follows:

A. The Economy Act is wrong in principle and unfair in application because—

First. It seeks to tie the buying power of the Federal employee to its lever in 1928, when prices were admittedly inflated and he was at a serious disadvantage as compared with the nongovernmental worker, whose pay was increasing to meet rising prices.

Second. By basing Federal salaries upon any cost-of-living index it ignores the fact that while commodities may fluctuate in price, fixed obligations do not, but remain at the same level regardless of the value of the dollar. Regardless of current or future prices, it is now 15 percent more difficult for the Federal employee to meet taxes, which will be higher, and fixed obligations in the form of payments upon insurance, mortgages, and installments on time purchases.

Third. The act seems to be a misapplication, in reverse, of the President's ideas on the justice of a "commodity dollar", or a dollar enabling debtors to pay in the same kind of dollars they borrowed. Here the debtor still has to pay, but he has fewer dollars to pay with.

B. Not only was the original act unfair, but this bill is contrary to its purposes and intentions because—

First. The misguided, though superficially reasonable, theory of the Economy Act was that Government salaries should correspond to the cost of living. The President has embarked upon a program for raising prices, and if prices have increased and shall increase during the next year in proportion to the efforts to that end and to their cost to the Nation, then salaries should likewise increase with the prices and not 6 months after the higher levels have been effective.

Second. If the emergency recovery measures are so foredoomed to failure that only a 5-percent restoration of Government pay would be justifiable by next July, then there is no justification for the extraordinary recovery expenses in other Budget items.

Third. If the administration proposes to raise prices to 1926 levels, which were even higher than those of 1928, then, to be consistent, the President should demand legislation not only for restoring the cuts but increasing the base pay. Let Congress take the President at his word and legislate the restoration of pay, giving the President the authority to make reductions if his program fails. That would be in conformity with justice, whereas discretionary power to keep salaries at 90 percent of normal despite rising prices is clearly contrary to the intentions of the Economy Act.

Fourth. Despite the survey of the cost of living submitted to the President, wholesale prices, which will control the cost of living quickly as old stocks are reduced, have increased, according to official figures, so rapidly, especially in clothing and foods, that immediate restoration of pay would be justified and in keeping with the intentions of the Economy Act.

C. The present bill, by its discrimination against the civil and other services, is one of several factors under the present administration that tend to impair the morale of the civil service and that might ultimately destroy it completely.

First. Secure continuance in service and assured automatic increases are the foundations of the careers of Government employment, whether military or not, and are definite compensations that induce persons to forego the higher pay that prevails in private life. This bill undermines that principle to a large degree.

Second. In line with this injury to the civil service, there is also the fact that the Government has employed in its new agencies some 30,000 persons from outside the civil service, performing substantially the same functions, frequently at higher rates than the career salaries, for the same work.

Third. Government relief expenditures, designed simply to afford subsistence jobs for the unemployed, include wages and salaries in excess of many of the civil-service salaries, even at the basic rates before the cuts were made. Clearly this bill should be modified to restore the injured morale of the Government services by at least restoring the pay.

This is not something that has sprung up over night. Surely the Director of the Budget or someone in the administration had the same information that I had as a member of the subcommittee when I listened to the testimony with respect to the restoration of the 15-percent pay cut, and the only basis in the Economy Act under which we gave the President this authority was on the basis of the cost of living. However, we did fail to tell the President how to ascertain the cost of living, and knowing the facts as I do, and realizing the money you have spent to raise these prices, I am not willing to believe that we should not restore these cuts right here and now.

Such action on your part will not delay the passage of the bill. If you support the motion to recommit, the bill will come right back here with the 15 percent restored. There is no question about this. Now, it is up to you. I believe this vote is a telling vote. You can go ahead and vote against the motion to recommit, but when you do we will all know that you are voting against the restoration of the 15-percent pay cut, and you are also admitting by that vote that this great work that your administration has been attempting to do for recovery has gone for naught or at least for very little—just 5 percent of Government pay, which will only amount to $125,000,000. I am sure you are not going to look at it in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman from Connecticut answer a question right there?

Mr. GOSS. Gladly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Let us suppose that the cost of living has gone up 5 percent or more. Does the gentleman agree with me in the belief that the farmers of this country have not received any benefit of that with respect to most of their products?

Mr. GOSS. They have received a little benefit, but I will say to the gentleman that what I believe is the trouble with the farmers is just this: In 1914 I took the average farm commodity prices and put them at 100, and at the same time I put his taxes—Federal, State, and local—at 100, and in 1932 the average of farm prices was down to 78, but his taxes were up to 266. Now, what good did it do the farmer, even if he did get a little increase in the prices of his products, when his taxes increased to 266?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute in order to answer the question.

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. As you all know, I am a farmer and ought to know something about farming and the prices of butter, eggs, and other commodities. The price of grain has gone up, but other prices have not gone up, and yet I understand the cost of living has gone up. The processing tax has not helped the farmers one bit and the burden has been thrown back upon the farmers so they are harder up today than they ever were before.

Mr. GOSS. I am glad to see that the gentleman agrees with me that the cost of living has gone up and, therefore, I presume the gentleman will vote for my motion to recommit.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I think the cost of living has gone up. I know it costs more to buy a loaf of bread. as well as many other things that the farmer uses, unless the farmer's wife bakes the bread herself, and I blame the Secretary of Agriculture for the whole thing.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, at the outset I want to reciprocate the pleasantries of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Connecticut. It is really a pleasure to work on the Appropriations Committee of the House. There is never any partisanship in that committee. There is often a wide difference of opinion, an emphatic difference of opinion, but there is never any bitter partisanship. Usually the members of that committee are intent on one purpose, and that is to try to safeguard the Public Treasury and yet make an adequate provision for all Government activities. It is a real pleasure to work with both those gentlemen, who are able and industrious.

I am particularly interested in the statement that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] made about a proposal by the minority to make a motion to recommit the bill. In all good humor I want to characterize that effort the same as the distinguished gentleman from New York characterized some monetary policy of the present administration, that it is baloney, and that is all. [Laughter.]

In the first place, the rule that was adopted by a majority of the House—a small majority, it is true—prohibits any instructions to the Appropriations Committee.

The only motion to recommit that is in order is a straight motion to send the bill back to the committee, and I can definitely assure the House that there has been no change of heart by a majority of the members of the Appropriations Committee; they are going to stand 100 percent back of the President of the United States on this proposition. [Applause.] So you send it back and we will bring it back here the same way.

And now, gentlemen, let us look for a moment at the rule. I remember very well the first speech I made on the floor of the House—and I have not made a great many. I remember I waxed myself into a great lather over gag rules of the House, the hip-pocket rule, where the great prerogatives of Members of Congress as representatives of the people were thwarted by the Chairman of the Rules Committee walking around with a rule in his pocket and refusing to bring it out.

I have been here 12 years and many things have happened. The longer I sit here the more autocratic I become in my attitude toward rules.

I believe in rules. It is the only way the majority party, which is responsible and must take the credit or bear the blame of what happens—it is the only way that the majority can work its will. If that judgment is bad, the country will know it and pass judgment accordingly.

This rule is not bad, however. We have been under the Republican administration so long that our system has got so it can stand gag rules pretty well.

The worst feature of this rule, in a casual view of it, is that it not only prohibits the amending of the legislative proposals of the bill under consideration but it carries it on into other bills.

Now, at first blush it is shocking that you undertake here, now, to prohibit legislation in the future; but let us examine it for a moment.

Is it not better to have now, once and for all, a legislative determination on whether we are going to reinstate all Government salaries on a 100-percent basis or whether we are going to reinstate 5 percent and give authority to the President to make as much as a 10-percent cut based upon the cost of living?

That is what the rule permitted us to do; and if the House stands by the vote it cast yesterday, we have established that policy. We have made our record, for good or for bad, and we will not have the constant confusion of having every appropriation bill that comes up here stage the same old fight all over again; and, conceivably, we might have one bill reinstating 5 percent, another reinstating 10 percent, and another putting back the whole salary. By this rule we have said that in this bill we will establish, once and for all, the question of what our policy shall be with reference to salaries for the next fiscal year, and that the decision shall obtain in all the other appropriation bills. But, Mr. Chairman, the House has not foreclosed itself from any right it has to change the basic legislation relative to salaries. We can tomorrow repeal the whole Economy Act, if legislation comes in the regular routine to the House for consideration; and if the committee would not report such a bill out, we can move to discharge the committee by getting 145 Members to sign such a petition.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The gentleman does not suppose that the Democratic majority of the House is going to bring in a bill of that character?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, I am quite confident they will not, but I am speaking of the fact that by the adoption of that rule yesterday we have not foreclosed the right of a majority of this House, whenever it sees fit so to do, to change the basic law, which is the economy law.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think a few moments ago the gentleman said the House spoke yesterday on that policy. The House did not have an opportunity yesterday to vote on the direct question of whether or not we are in favor of the restoration of 15-percent increase for Government employees. You would not give us that opportunity.

Mr. WOODRUM. If that was not the vote yesterday, then I do not understand what we talked about for 3 hours. Nobody challenged any other provision of the economy legislation. Nobody said anything about the automatic increase for the Army, the Navy, and the Marine Corps; nobody said anything about a number of other economy provisions that were contained in that legislation. The whole thing was directed at the salary proposition, and the point was made that by defeating that rule it would then be in order to put back the basic salaries, and the whole issue was directly upon that one point.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. All right, but why did you not permit the House yesterday to take a direct vote on whether or not we were in favor of the 15-percent increase?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think we did permit the House to do that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I do not.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is a difference of opinion, and we are still good friends.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Because the gentleman from Virginia and other Democratic leaders on that side of the House appealed to the Democratic organization to stand back of the President, saying that this is what the President wants.

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. But you did not give the House an opportunity to say whether or not we wanted to restore the 15-percent increase.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman makes a distinction between what my personal opinion is of whether the 15 percent ought to go back and whether I should yield to the President on that.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The point I am trying to make is this: Why did you not give the House an opportunity to vote on the motion to recommit, which would have let the House decide whether or not we are in favor of the restoration of the 15-percent increase.

Mr. WOODRUM. To have done that would have thrown every appropriation bill that comes in here into the same fight we are now going through, and the majority in its wisdom, I think, decided that once and for all we should have that out and get through with it, and we hope we are through with it.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BACON. As I understand the gentleman, then it is his definite opinion that all those who voted for the rule were against the 15-percent restoration in pay?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I did not say that.

Mr. BACON. That is what I understand to be the gentleman's opinion.

Mr. WOODRUM. In the first place to correct my friend, literally the bill restores 5 percent. There is no 15 percent involved. There is only 10 percent involved. In the second place, a great many Members very freely stated that personally they would like to see the whole salary restoration. I do not mind saying to the House, reiterating what I said yesterday, that personally I should have liked to see the full salary restoration, and continue the authority in the President to make the cut the next year, if in his judgment it ought to be made; but in this emergency the man at the other end of the Avenue is the man the American people are looking to to guide them. I believe they want Congress to uphold his hands. I believe my constituents want me on matters of policy, if I can do so without sacrificing my own fundamental ideas of right and wrong, to yield in my personal opinion to the President, and I do it gladly.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the matter had not been settled finally and for all yesterday, we might have had our Republican friends here on one bill restoring the 15 percent salary, and on the nine bills for the other nine departments they might have only a handful of Republicans here, and there would not be any restoration at all.

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Might not the President had some such thing as this in mind in recommending that the pay cut be continued? I have just received figures from the Budget Department that next July we will have an increased appropriation of $63,217,499 for just the 5-percent restoration of pay. If you would divide that on the basis of $100 a month among the unemployed, you would have 632,174 people who could eat regularly.

Taking that over a period of 1 year, what is the saving? One hundred and eighty-nine million six hundred and forty-two thousand four hundred and ninety-seven dollars for 1 year, on the 15-percent cut. Figured on the same basis of $100 per person, this total would put to work 1,896,424 of the unemployed. Would that not be justification for all of us who have Government jobs, dividing our income with those who are unemployed through no fault of their own? [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the lady very much for that very pertinent and helpful observation.

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I was very much interested in the gentleman's explanation of the vote for or against the gag rule yesterday. I wonder if the gentleman could verify my opinion about this matter, which is that if the President wants a gag rule on this proposition he might in some way have unmistakably expressed his opinion to Congress that he wanted us gagged? The President has indicated by his message just how he wanted certain legislation passed, but I have no way of knowing that he wanted that gag rule, except by the statement of the persons who were in favor of the gag rule.

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, the gentleman is asking whether the President had asked us to gag the House, to do what he wanted them to do. He did not make any such request. He said he would like to have this legislation passed. The leaders of the House are the ones who determined upon the mechanics of getting results.

Mr. HENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. HENNEY. Is it not true that the 15-percent restoration would restore to the Members of Congress $1,500 a year each?

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mr. MILLARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. I am a great admirer of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia. I consider him one of the most able men in the House.

Mr. WOODRUM. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. MILLARD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that if the majority sent this bill back to the committee, he would defy the House?

Mr. WOODRUM. I believe the gentleman did understand me to say that. I think that is my opinion. I will say to my good friend from New York that I feel so keenly that the President of the United States in a matter of policy ought to be followed that I guess I would be willing to stand here alone and back him if it were necessary, but I do not believe it will be necessary. May I say this to my good friend, what is the difference if we put back the entire 15 percent and gave the President the right to cut it 10 percent? The mechanics of it is the same. It would do the employees no more good. As a matter of fact, by this bill we give them back now 5 percent, and put that beyond the power of anybody to cut. That is a 5-percent restoration. Then we have said to the President of the United States that if the cost of living increased, and I believe it will increase, personally, he has a right to restore any portion of that 10 percent that the survey shows he should restore.

Now, I must get away from this and go to some other matters in the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Going back to the gag-rule question, the gentleman admits it was necessary, at least in the opinion of the leadership, to gag the House in order to prevent restoration of the 15 percent?

Mr. WOODRUM. If the gentleman wishes to state it that way. The leadership of the House thought it was desirable to have, on the first appropriation bill, a definite determination of whether the Congress would follow the President on that recommendation, or have their own idea about it, and the only way to do it was to fasten it down and say, "When we decide this once, we will not have to come back here and legislate about it again."

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Notwithstanding the fact that you have a 200 majority.

Mr. WOODRUM. We did not have a majority of 200 yesterday. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. I do not wish to be misunderstood on this. The gentleman did not intend to say that he interpreted anyone who voted against the gag rule as not being willing to follow the President?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I did not say that. I do not interpret anybody's action but my own. It keeps me busy doing that.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. CROWTHER. I have served a long time with the gentleman and I realize his value as a Member of this House and his conservative ideas. I wonder if the gentleman thinks that he illustrated good procedure or policy today when he suggested that even if this House instructed the committee by its vote, if the House sent the bill back by recommitment, that the gentleman would ignore the action of the House and bring the bill back, in order to maintain Executive favor, in spite of the fact that the House had recommitted it? The gentleman said he would bring it back just the same, in spite of the action of the House.

Mr. WOODRUM. But the gentleman overlooks one important fact. The House cannot instruct the Committee on Appropriations to bring it back with a full salary restoration.

Mr. CROWTHER. I know, under this rule.

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the rule we adopted yesterday.

Mr. CROWTHER. But you emanated the general principle that if there was such instruction, you would bring it back just exactly as it was, if they had the power to do that.

Mr. WOODRUM. The only thing this House can do is to recommit the bill generally. The House yesterday by adopting the rule said that it would not desire to recommit this bill with instructions on the economy provisions.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am only suggesting that the gentleman, as a matter of general policy, suggests overriding the wishes of the House and bringing the bill back under circumstances of that kind, just as it was.

Mr. WOODRUM. But my friend's premise is not accurate.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am only basing it on the gentleman's own statement.

Mr. WOODRUM. Because the House cannot recommit the bill with instructions on the salary proposition. The only thing the House can do is recommit the bill generally to the committee. I say it is my judgment that if the House recommits this bill generally to the Committee on Appropriations, without instructions, which is all it can do, that the committee will bring it back, just as it is now on the salary question.

Mr. CROWTHER. But the gentleman would be cognizant of the fact that the reason that was done was the salary question? The gentleman would not be ignorant of the purpose for which it was recommitted to the committee.

Mr. WOODRUM. I would be cognizant of this fact, that pending the time the House decided to follow the President and the time we took a vote on recommitting the bill, my friend and his colleagues had been busy in getting votes and stirring up enough change of sentiment to change the slight majority that we had yesterday.

Therefore I would feel perfectly free—feel I was acting in perfectly good faith—to stand by the position taken yesterday.

Mr. CROWTHER. Does the gentleman think that is carrying out the suggestion made by the President in his message, of a beloved union between the Executive and the legislative branches of the Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think I have answered the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. Of course, if this bill should go back on a motion to recommit and the committee brought the same bill in again, it could still keep going back and forth until somebody decided to do something Congress wanted done. Is not this true?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, that is true.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to get away from this if I may. May I reiterate that this bill in no way forecloses the House, or any committee of the House, on any question relating to veterans' benefits.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take any time on the independent establishments embodied in this bill unless there is some particular matter about which a colleague desires to interrogate me, but I shall go directly to the section dealing with veterans, because, so far as I am able to see, this is the portion of the bill in which Members are now particularly interested.

The legislative provisions carried in this bill, as was pointed out yesterday, in no way foreclose any committee of the House in the matter of making fundamental changes in the basic law relating to veterans' benefits. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] on the floor of the House a few moments ago, it seems to me, hit the keynote on that. Last year the economy bill, in title I, conferred on the President the right to readjust veterans' payments. Certain regulations were authorized to be promulgated by the President which should have the effect of basic law.

There is no doubt of the fact that Congress can at any time it feels so disposed reclaim jurisdiction of this matter and pass any basic law changing any regulation the President may make; but I want to call your attention to the fact, as was pointed out by the gentleman from Texas, that the President said last year immediately after these first regulations were promulgated and our attention was directed to the fact that great injustices were going to be done under those regulations, when a committee from Congress went down to wait upon the President and when the national commander of the American Legion waited upon the President, the President assured those gentlemen that the matter of veterans' relief would have his constant scrutiny and attention; that whenever it appeared that injustices were being done he would not hesitate to remedy them so far as he could by a change in regulations.

Now, I want to call attention to the fact—I shall insert a table in the RECORD—that since the economy bill, which made drastic cuts in veterans' payments, the regulations have been so changed in various respects as to reinsert $96,000,000 of veterans' benefits.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, the gentleman realizes the President now has it in his power to correct the evils still existing, that he may do it without legislation.

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; certainly. He still has the power. He has made various changes in the regulations and has various other changes in the regulations under consideration.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does not the gentleman feel it would make things more secure for the veterans and make it more certain that justice would be done them if we passed certain bills making it the law that they should receive certain benefits?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I do not. I think the President ought to be given a chance.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But some of the men die before action is taken.

Mr. WOODRUM. Just a moment. As was pointed out by the gentleman from Texas, whom all of us recognize as a man zealous in his efforts for the veterans, the logical, the orderly, the proper way to approach this matter is by having some central forum, a tribunal where Members of Congress, you and myself, veterans' organizations and posts, the several representative organizations may go and make their suggestions, their criticisms of these regulations, their suggested changes; and have that committee use that study and those hearings, either to bring in a bill to Congress or to confer with the President upon the propriety of certain changes in the regulations.

I do not hesitate to say that in my judgment there are many points in these regulations which ought to be changed. I would welcome an opportunity of going before the Veterans' Legislative Committee and there giving them the benefit of my personal judgment for what it might be worth.

There are many complaints. The gentleman from Texas mentioned one, the case of a man working for the Government and drawing as much as $50 a month—he must forfeit all but $6 of his pension. This is obviously unfair and ought to be changed. There are many other points in these regulations that should be changed. We should concentrate things like these in an intelligent and orderly way; and if our legislative committee brings in legislation we might use that as a basis of negotiation with the President for a great deal of relief. Then if sufficient relief is not found, in the judgment of Congress, we still have the right as a legislative body of taking the matter out of his hands and legislating upon the subject.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman mentioned the $90,000,000 curtail in slashes by veteran legislation. Was that $90,000,000 a curtailment made by voluntary changes in regulations by the President, or was part of that by virtue of the Steiwer-Cutting amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM. Some was undoubtedly caused by the Steiwer-Cutting amendment, which the President very readily accepted and acquiesced in, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. MOTT. Did I understand the gentleman to say the President readily accepted the Steiwer-Cutting amendment?

Mr. WOODRUM. Is that the amendment affecting Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. MOTT. The entire Steiwer-Cutting amendment. It is my recollection—and I think Members of the House will bear me out in it—that the President not only strenuously objected to the Steiwer-Cutting amendment but prevented its passage, and then a compromise was effected between the President and Congress.

Mr. WOODRUM. Whatever was acceptable to the President is in here.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. GIFFORD. My question is right in line with the query of the gentleman from Oregon. Owing to inability to prove the service-connected nature of their disabilities, what can the gentleman suggest be done to give justice to the Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. A number of suggestions have been made about this matter. One which sounds equitable to me is to give all Spanish-American War veterans who were 50 percent disabled or who are 55 years of age a flat pension of $20 a month; give all Spanish-American War veterans who were 75 percent disabled or who are 65 years of age a flat pension of $30 a month.

Take all other Spanish-American War veterans who are totally and permanently disabled and give them $40.

You may sit down with a pencil and pad and figure out any kind of a scheme you desire, but this proposal would take care of almost every Spanish-American War veteran. About the only group that would not be taken care of would be Spanish-American War veterans under 55 years of age without any disability. It would cost about $25,000,000.

Mr. GIFFORD. The other observation is, because of that basic law we passed last year, did it not make the President helpless to do justice to the Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so. I think the President has authority under the regulations to put in force this plan I speak of. I believe he would have authority to do that. It may be that we will have to change the basic law.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman realize that there are between 24,000 and 25,000 cases of Spanish-American War veterans to be heard by the Board of Appeals? The forms have been sent down to the Bureau. Many thousands have waited week after week throughout the summer without the vestige of a hearing. No appeal board was appointed until a few weeks ago to hear these cases.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am in sympathy with what you say and hope that something can be done to relieve the Spanish-American War veterans. I realize how difficult it is, how almost impossible it is, to go back now and say that a Spanish-American War veteran must show a service connection for his disability.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And they also have received their checks for a number of months for the amount of their old pensions. Suddenly they heard they were cut, and then they were told to refund the money in some cases.

Mr. WOODRUM. I appreciate the situation where we have given a veteran the benefits for a number of years and then suddenly take them away from him. However, I want to proceed in an orderly way. I do not want to come here today or tomorrow and undertake in this appropriation bill, without hearing, to pass legislation affecting matters of that kind.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. DITTER. Are you in position to give the House an assurance that the White House approves of the program of relief which you are suggesting to the House?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. I am speaking entirely for myself. I cannot give the House any such assurance.

Mr. DITTER. Then, so far as the Chief Executive is concerned, there is no present program of relief?

Mr. WOODRUM. I cannot speak for the Executive. I do know this: I have been informed various proposals have been made and are now on the President's desk. That is all I know about that particular matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. In the event the President should liberalize the veterans' legislation, is there any money available for increased benefits to the veterans? Does this carry any increase?

Mr. WOODRUM. The appropriations carried in this bill are based on existing regulations, on the regulations as they exist today, as far as the Veterans' Administration is able to tell.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Then he might say: "We cannot give any further and liberal relief to the veterans because the money is not available."

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, he could say that; but I do not believe the President of the United States, knowing that the Congress wanted him to give some benefits to the veterans, would assume such an attitude as the gentleman has indicated.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. We all appreciate that there should be changes. Does not the gentleman think we should make some provision in the appropriation bill for these changes?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not. I do not think you ought to appropriate money until the President makes the changes. We do not do that in connection with anything else. We do not appropriate money on the theory that at some time or other Congress may authorize a certain project to be undertaken. We wait until there is an authorization. I think that is the orderly way in which to do it.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, as I understand the gentleman, he is assuming there will be no increase in pensions during the next fiscal year.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am not assuming anything of the kind.

Mr. DOWELL. I think you must.

Mr. WOODRUM. We are providing for the pensions to be paid. If there are any changes in the regulations, Congress will be in session several months and will be back in January of next year, and those changes can be taken care of before the next fiscal year is half over. If the President should authorize changes in the regulations, which would give more money to the veterans, the Veterans' Administration will have one half of their fiscal year's fund left that can be used until such time as Congress can appropriate for whatever they may need.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman tell us how much less the appropriation for the administration of the veterans is this fiscal year as compared with the last fiscal year?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; I shall be glad to do so. I have a tabulation. The gentleman will find in the report a statement which shows that for the fiscal year 1934 the total appropriation for the Veterans' Administration, not including the retirement fund, was $581,988,000 and for the next fiscal year $532,360,091. This shows on the face of it some decrease in the appropriation. That is in spite of the fact considerable additional benefits have been granted by change in the regulations brought about by this fact, that when the Veterans' Administration made the estimates for the fiscal year 1934, based on the change in regulations incident to the economy bill, they were doing hardly more than trying to make a good guess. New regulations had been promulgated entirely changing the basis of rating and the entitlements to pension and about all that could be done was use such precedents that they might have and which were not of a great deal of benefit, and estimate grossly for the balance.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. How much has been laid aside to take care of the approximately 4,000 cases that have been reported to the Federal Employees' Commission for injuries to the C.W.A. workers? Not the C.C.C., but the C.W.A.? There have been 3,249 reported injured in the C.C.C. How much has been laid aside for the hospitalization of those men, who can go into contract hospitals as well as Government hospitals? We have men hospitalized under those three services.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not know what the breakdown of that is.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very anxious to know if the gentleman is laying money aside for those benefits and not for similar veterans' benefits.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Veterans' Administration has taken that into account in estimating the hospital requirements.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Of course, they only have approximately 450 of the C.C.C.'s and all our other Government hospitals and the private hospitals are going to have a number of them and civilian doctors are going to have the care of some of them.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the Committee, I should like to insert in the RECORD a statement prepared by the Veterans' Administration, showing the effects of Public, No. 2, the changes which the regulations made in the law that existed prior to its passage, and also some statistical information with reference to the number of veterans of various wars that are affected and the effect this has had upon the appropriations. I do not want to take the time of the Committee to go unnecessarily into detail in my address, but I should like to put this information in the RECORD as well as one or two other charts giving information which I think will be useful.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

APPLICATION OF PUBLIC, NO. 2, AND PUBLIC, NO. 78, SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

The enactment of Public, No. 2, and Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, and the Presidential regulations issued thereunder, materially changed the provisions for relief in the form of pensions, hospitalization, and domiciliary care previously provided for veterans or peace-time soldiers who served in the armed forces of the United States commencing with the Spanish-American War.

The major changes in the entitlement to pensions authorized by the above amendatory legislation may briefly be stated as follows:

1. Veterans of all wars subsequent to 1898 suffering from diseases or injuries incurred in or aggravated by service are paid at a uniform rate, depending upon the percent of disability, $90 per month, with certain exceptions, being the rate for permanent and total disability.

2. The duration of the several wars or expeditions was modified to more nearly agree with the period of actual combat.

3. The monthly payments for disabilities incurred during peace-time service were placed at one half the value of those incurred during war-time service.

4. The payment of benefits to veterans of the World War for non-service-connected disabilities was restricted to those veterans who are totally and permanently disabled, although for veterans of the War with Spain, Boxer rebellion, Philippine insurrection nonservice pensions were also authorized for those who were 55 years of age or over and 50 percent disabled, and those who had attained the age of 62.

5. The granting of service connection on the basis of presumption was materially modified.

6. The value of awards made to veterans or dependents of deceased veterans residing in foreign countries was reduced to 50 percent of the value of those residing within the United States or its possessions.

7. Emergency officers' retirement pay was restricted to those disabilities incurred in or resulting from the performance of military duty.

8. For the war prior to the War with Spain the basic laws were not changed, but a flat reduction of 10 percent was made in the value of the awards.

9. The payments for death pensions to beneficiaries of deceased veterans of the War with Spain whose death was due to a service-connected disability were made at the rate provided for the dependents of veterans of the World War; however, the payments to dependents of veterans of the War with Spain whose death was not due to service were reduced to 50 percent of the value of service-connected awards.

10. Hospitalization and domiciliary care was limited to those veterans requiring treatment for a service-connected disability or those who served 90 days or more during the war period and were suffering from a permanent disability, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric disease and had no adequate means of support.

As of March 31, 1933, there were 1,016,561 living veterans and the dependents of 279,926 deceased veterans receiving some form of pensions; however, through the application of the provisions of Public, No. 2, and Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, and the decrease by death and other reasons the number of pensioners had been decreased on November 30, 1933, to 514,784 living veterans and the dependents of 265,528 deceased veterans.

The following itemization shows a comparison of the pensioners on the rolls as of March 31, 1933, and November 30, 1933, distributed by wars:

Wars	Mar. 31, 1933		Nov. 30, 1933

Veterans	1,016,561		514,784
		1,296,487		780,312

[1] Includes 9,276 peace-time veterans and dependents of 36 peace-time veterans previously carried as veterans of the World War.

A further comparative analysis of the beneficiaries under the provisions of the several acts relating to veterans of the World War, by type of benefit, is as follows:

Type of benefit	Number on the rolls
	Mar. 31, 1933	Nov. 30, 1933
Service connected, war time	[1] 338,580	307,117
Nonservice connected, war time	[2] 425,894	27,283
Disabled emergency officers' retirement pay	6,037	1,505
Death pensions	[3] 101,553	[4] 100,462
Peace time service connected		9,276
Total	872,064	445,643

[1] Disability compensation.
[2] Disability allowance.
[3] Death compensation.
[4] Includes dependents of 36 peace-time veterans previously carried as veterans of the World War.

The above comparison of beneficiaries under the provisions of the several acts relating to veterans and the dependents of veterans of the World War shows that the greater part of the reduction in the number of pensioners on the rolls as of March 31, 1933, is shown for veterans receiving benefits for non-service-connected disabilities. This is accounted for by the provisions of the amendatory legislation whereby the payment of pensions for this type of beneficiaries was limited to those who are permanently and totally disabled.

The following itemization shows a comparison of the distribution of the disbursements by wars for the months of March 1933 and November 1933:

Wars	March 1933		November 1933
War of 1812		$300.00		$267.50

[1] Includes $181,869.80 for peace-time veterans, formerly carried as World War veterans.

The reduction in disbursements indicated above for wars prior to the War with Spain is due primarily to the losses to the rolls by death, and the application of the provisions of section 18, Public, No. 2, and section 15, Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress. Section 18, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, provides that a reduction of 10 percent shall be applied to any pension or other monetary gratuity payable to former members of the military service in wars prior to the Spanish-American War, and their dependents, for service, age, disease, or injury. Section 15, Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, provides that every pension payable under any private act, not subject to the provisions of section 18, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, shall be reduced 15 percent.

Provisions were made by the amendatory legislation for Special Boards of Review to be appointed by the President to consider those awards allowed on the basis of presumptive service-connected disabilities as set forth by the World War Veterans' Act, as amended. Of the 51,213 awards based on presumptive service-connected disabilities, reviewed by the special boards, 21,955 were continued and 29,258 were discontinued.

Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, provided that hospitalization should be made available to veterans requiring care and treatment for disabilities incurred in or aggravated by service. In addition to the above type of veterans, hospitalization and domiciliary care was extended to those veterans who served 90 days or more during a war period and who were suffering from a permanent disability, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric diseases and who had no adequate means of support.

As of March 31, 1933, there were 42,823 patients remaining in hospitals and 20,544 veterans receiving domiciliary care, while as of November 30, 1933, there were 34,738 patients remaining in hospitals and 11,439 veterans receiving domiciliary care.

The following itemization shows a distribution of the number remaining in hospitals and homes by type of beneficiary:

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I here insert a statement showing the work of the special boards dealing with the presumptive cases and an explanatory letter:

DECEMBER 20, 1933.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I desire to report that the so-called "presumptively service-connected claims" disallowed under the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, have been reviewed pursuant to the provisions of paragraphs I and III of section 20, Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, regulations and instructions issued pursuant thereto, and there is attached a chart which discloses the results of the review by the regional areas and the central office. This report is subject to minor adjustments now being made.

The analysis of the review discloses that the boards operating in the regional office, Charlotte, N.C., had the highest percentage of allowed cases of any office and that the special boards in the central office had the lowest percentage of allowed cases. The high percentage of allowed cases in North Carolina is attributable to the fact that there exists in the State a decidedly liberal attitude toward veterans' relief, particularly tuberculous diseases, occasioned, no doubt, by the climatic conditions and extensive facilities favorable to the treatment of this disease. The low percentage allowed by the boards in the central office is due to the fact that the cases reviewed include large blocks of foreign and domestic cases in which there is very little, if any, evidence indicating the origin and development of the tuberculous and neuropsychiatric conditions.

The variation in the percentage of allowed cases throughout the country is attributed to the many human elements involved in the make-up of the special review boards and circumstances over which the Veterans' Administration had no control. This undoubtedly in many instances was due to the attitude of the individual members of the special boards, since it is to be expected that some persons have more liberal views on veterans' relief and interpret the law, regulations, and instructions more broadly than others. Furthermore, it is believed that in some instances the attitude of the public on veterans' relief influenced the outside members toward liberality in granting service connection.

I have observed that the cooperating agencies in a number of regional areas were more diligent in the development of cases presented to the special boards.

In some of the areas more veterans availed themselves of the privilege of a personal appearance before the special boards than in others, and an analysis shows that in these areas the percentage of allowed cases was somewhat higher than in those where the veterans did not appear before the boards.

Apparently some of the boards placed great emphasis on combat service as a causative factor in the subsequent development of a neuropsychiatric or tuberculous condition.

It is recognized that climatic conditions in a few of the regional areas are peculiarly favorable to persons taking treatment for or convalescing from the ill effects of tuberculous conditions and naturally there is an unusually large number of veterans residing in the territory of those offices—for instance, Arizona, Colorado, and North Carolina, who developed the condition shortly after the period of the war. It follows, therefore, that the percentage of allowed cases reviewed by the special boards would be unusually high in those areas.

It is believed the President would be interested in the attached observations which have been received from outstanding citizens who served as members of the special review boards.

It is impossible at this time to definitely predict the reaction of the general public and the veterans in particular; however, it is believed that the special review has served to further assure the veterans of the President's desire to afford adequate relief to deserving disabled veterans.

A complete report covering the activities of the special review boards is being prepared, and I shall be pleased to make it available to the President if desired.

Respectfully,

FRANK T. HINES, Administrator.

The honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
The White House, Washington, D.C.

[1] Subject to minor change.

Mr. WOODRUM. Now, Mr. Chairman, may I say in conclusion, unless there is some other information I can give the Committee, under this bill there is no doubt about the fact it will be in order to add money under any of these heads in the Veterans' Administration if the House, in its judgment, cares to do so; but what do we accomplish? It will not be in order, it could not be in order to grant additional benefits to any veteran—and why not? Because it would be changing the basic law. This right was not taken away by the rule. The rule had nothing to do with that; but it would be in order, for instance, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] said earlier in the afternoon, when we come to the question of compensation for service-connected disabilities to arbitrarily increase the gross amount in any sum that the Committee, in its judgment, saw fit to do, but you would not give one penny more to any veteran and you would not authorize the Veterans' Administration to add one penny to the compensation of any veteran. It would simply be an idle, useless gesture.

Mr. BUSBY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BUSBY. Suppose these amounts were substantially increased and appropriate legislation should follow, even against the will of the leadership of the House, would it not be a very advantageous thing to have appropriation available when the legislation is ultimately adopted?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so, because if the President makes any change in these regulations or if the Veterans' Committee brings in basic legislation changing any of these rights, not a member of the Appropriations Committee, I am sure, will hesitate to bring in the appropriation to meet the obligation; but it would be an utterly idle and useless thing to add money to an appropriation in this bill that is not authorized by basic law, and it does seem to me that it is in the interest of the veterans.

The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWNING], and others who spoke yesterday on the matter, I am sure have hit the keynote when they say that the orderly and logical way for the Members of the House interested in the veterans to proceed is to go to the legislative committee and there make such changes or recommendations as in the judgment of the Congress ought to be made.

Mr. FOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FOSS. I have always admired the clear and concise way in which the gentleman from Virginia has presented the appropriation bill which he has had in charge to the House. I think the gentleman has made a very fair and clear statement with regard to the Spanish War veterans. I would like to ask the gentleman this question. Will the gentleman and his colleagues on that side of the aisle join with us in passing a basic law that will take care of the Spanish War veterans' situation?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think that is a very fair question. I should have said, and I shall revise my remarks to put in the figures right after I suggested the plan, that the plan I suggested about Spanish War veterans would cost $25,000,000.

Now, the gentleman asks whether I will join in passing basic law. I took this position when we passed the economy bill: I believed we could trust the President of the United States to treat the veterans fairly and honestly and humanely and, unlike the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], I have not yet reached the point where I think the President has not endeavored honestly and clearly to do this, and I want to see the President of the United States given a chance to do this job, and I believe he will do it. I would like to see the legislative committee of the House have their hearings and determine upon their proposals and take specific recommendations to the President and ask him to revise his regulations in those respects. I believe they will meet a spirit of cooperation at the White House. If the time comes—and I believe it will never come—when the President of the United States manifests a disinclination to be fair, honest, and just with the veterans, then it is time enough to talk about recalling the authority and power we gave him to deal with the matter.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. In other words, if I understand the gentleman correctly, this bill will definitely provide a 5-percent increase for the civil employees of the Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. Beginning July 1.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. And the passage of this bill precludes any other action.

Mr. WOODRUM. Unless the cost of living justifies the President in reinstating some additional portion of the 10 percent.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. The reason I ask the question is because I am interested in the Federal employees in our municipalities, as well as the veterans. The farmers are paid for not growing wheat, for not growing cotton, and the residents of the municipalities are taxed to pay the farmers. We have received no direct benefit out of this, and the cost of living has been increased. I am unable to see where the basic prices in the cities have only risen 5 percent. I think they have risen 10 percent or even 15 percent, and to offset the judgment on the other side of the aisle, I may say that when we voted against the rule yesterday we did not vote with the Republican Party. The Democrats who voted in that way voted on principle against a certain phase of the rule, and as a representative of those Members from my State, I cannot believe the President has secured the correct figures from the Department of Labor when they say that our price level has only risen 5 percent, when the actual figures in the municipalities, so far as I am able to learn, show the increase is much more than 5 percent.

Mr. HENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. HENNEY. Do I understand that 5 percent will absolutely be restored on July 1; and, if the cost-of-living index rises 15 percent or more, the entire amount will be restored?

Mr. WOODRUM. Exactly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I confess I have not been in the Chamber during all the debate upon this bill, but I desire to ask the chairman of the committee in all good faith if he will turn his attention to the provision found on page 31 of the bill, commencing at line 10? I think, perhaps, that proviso was discussed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], but I would like to have from the chairman of the committee his explanation of that provision, and, very frankly, his defense of it, for, unless I am mistaken—and I would like to be put right if I am mistaken, of course—as a result of that proviso the President will be clothed with the power to increase the salaries of Members of this House, which to me is an extraordinary thing.

Mr. WOODRUM. I can understand that the gentleman from New York, under a very strict, literal interpretation of the effect of that language, might find it objectionable. I do not take that view of it, however. Frankly, if I had my way—and few of us have our own way about many things—if I had my way, I would say that there ought to be a graduated salary reduction, if any. I have never been in sympathy with the blanket 15-percent reduction, because when you take $15 out of $100 of a man with a low salary you are perhaps taking meat and bread from him. When you take $15 out of every $100 of a Member of Congress salary you are not taking meat and bread. So I think it would have been much better and more equitable to have had a graduated reduction, and perhaps no reduction at all, from the employees with a very low salary. But if you are going to put 5 percent of the salary back of the departmental heads in Washington drawing $5,000, $7,000, $12,000 from the Government, then I want the gentleman from New York and his colleagues in Congress to have their 5 percent back. If we are going to say to this class of high-salaried employees in the service that if the cost of living goes up for the next fiscal year their salary ought to be increased 5 percent, then I want my colleagues to have the same treatment.

While I can understand that there might be some objection to granting the authority to the President to raise our salaries, I do not think we are doing it. I think we have set a yardstick and said that if certain things happen as determined by the tribunal we have created, our salaries will be so and so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would like to ask the gentleman if I am correct in this: When we passed the Economy Act last spring we put in a clause reducing the salary of Congressmen 15 percent. We did that on our own volition and initiative. My complaint is now that you are turning over to the President of the United States the initiation of increasing congressional salaries—a shameful condition for the House to put itself in. We are a coordinate branch of the Government, and we should control and fix our own salaries. We should have the courage to do it and not allow the President of the United States to decide how much compensation Members of this House should receive.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is it not a fact that if you recommit this bill after July 1 our salaries would automatically be raised to $10,000? Thereby you would be voting to raise the salary to $10,000.

Mr. WOODRUM. I think that is a fair interpretation.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There would be no trouble in bringing in another bill.

Mr. WOODRUM. There is no trouble about bringing in bills; the trouble is to get them passed.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. BRITTEN. Am I correct in assuming that under title II the civil-service employees of the Government when one is promoted from one grade to another he takes the base pay of the grade to which he is promoted, but if an officer of the Army or the Navy is promoted to a higher grade he is prevented, under title II, from getting the base pay of the grade to which he is promoted?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think the gentleman's information is accurate, but I am very frank to say to him that I do not know much about the pay schedules or the way pay in the Navy is regulated. However, I do not think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. BRITTEN. What the gentleman's committee desired, I am sure, was to prevent increases in what is called the "fogey pay"; that is, the 5 percent for every 3 years. It does do that, but it goes further. If an ensign or a lieutenant, junior grade, is promoted to a lieutenant, senior grade, he is entitled under existing law to the pay of the grade to which he is promoted. That applies to civil-service employees throughout the Government also. As the language is written in the bill today, it will prevent him from getting the pay of the upper grade. On the contrary, if a lieutenant, junior grade, is promoted to a lieutenant, senior grade, he will serve as lieutenant, senior grade, with the pay of a lieutenant, junior grade, unless that language is modified.

Mr. WOODRUM. I am very glad to have the gentleman's explanation of that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My emotions on this proviso are pretty deep, because I think it involves the dignity of the House of Representatives; and while I have been here for a short time only, I have a very high regard for the dignity of this House and the Congress as an institution. Would the gentleman from Virginia decline unanimous consent to suspend the rule adopted yesterday so that the House might vote on that provision, to eliminate it?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Virginia personally would have absolutely no objection to eliminating that part of the section, but the gentleman from Virginia is now torn between his desire to do what personally he thinks he ought to do, and his ethical duty as the chairman of the committee which has received instructions from the House of Representatives.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is there no way under the rules of this House as now contrived by which the House may save its dignity?

Mr. WOODRUM. Oh, I think the gentleman is a little bit alarmed about the dignity of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Must we go, hat in hand, to the White House to ask what our pay is to be?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, I think the gentleman takes that much more seriously than is justified. I think if Congress has constituted a tribunal to determine a certain fact, to wit, it is said that when the President of the United States determines that the cost of living has reached a certain point, then the salaries of Government employees shall be raised, and that if such semijudicial determination is made, then our salaries should be proportionately restored.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But we are not Government employees.

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not feel that that is leaving the right to the President of the United States to fix our salaries. We have fixed them. I have no feeling about it whatever. I would be perfectly willing to see that clause eliminated, but I do not think it is a matter of the serious import that my friend from New York attaches to it, but I will say that I shall give my friend the stereotyped, demagogic answer that we often write to our constituents, namely, we will take it under consideration.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I have been hoping that the chairman would go into some of the questions with reference to the details of the supplies in the bill. As I understand it, there are these items of supplies, printing and binding for the different bureaus and the different independent establishments, and a rather large item of supplies for the Veterans' Bureau for the hospital maintenance and that sort of thing. Did the gentleman and his committee give any study to on what basis the estimates that were submitted were worked out? Were they worked out on the basis of the cost in 1933?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Did the gentleman give any study to the question of whether there had been any marked increase in prices of those supplies at the present time, and as to whether or not there would automatically result a very considerable deficiency in this appropriation bill as a result of those increases in prices?

Mr. WOODRUM. The committee questioned each bureau, each department that came before us, with reference to that, and particularly the Veterans' Administration, whose supply bill, of course, is very much larger than all the rest of the departments combined, and the gentleman, I think, placed in the RECORD—or I believe it was the gentleman from Connecticut—a statement from the Veterans' Bureau, showing there had been a very marked increase in the cost of supplies which they have to buy, and, if that increase continued in the same proportion, that there might have to be a deficiency appropriation; but General Hines stated he believed he had enough money to run him through the next year.

Mr. TABER. With the activities now going on?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. TABER. And with the prices that now exist?

Mr. WOODRUM. We discussed that very question with him of whether, under those circumstances, we should not increase that amount, because nobody wanted to deliberately invite a deficiency.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: For personal services in the office of the President, including the secretary to the President and two assistant secretaries to the President at $9,500 each, $113,188: Provided, That employees of the executive departments and other establishments of the executive branch of the Government may be detailed from time to time to the office of the President of the United States for such temporary assistance as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: On page 2, line 18, after the word "necessary", insert "Provided further, That there is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such additional amounts as may be necessary to pay the full rates of compensation authorized by the Classification Act to the officers and employees whose compensation is carried in the bill."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman state the point of order?

Mr. WOODRUM. The point of order is that the amendment is in conflict with title II of this bill, in that it increases the compensation.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia has made the point of order that this amendment is in conflict with title II of the bill. Is that correct?

Mr. WOODRUM. There was a great deal of confusion, but if I caught the wording of the amendment correctly, it put the salaries back to the basic salaries.

Mr. GOSS. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. That was the reason for the point of order. It is in conflict with title II.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to be heard on that Mr. Chairman.

In the first place, my understanding of the rule which was adopted yesterday, House Resolution 217, to be considered with this bill, only made amendments impossible on title II. We have not reached title II. We are considering title I, and in the bill I understand that the committee, under the rule, may offer amendments, and I respectfully call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in offering that amendment I am only applying that, as far as the people employed in this particular paragraph go. I wish to serve notice that if the point of order is overruled, I shall offer similar amendments as we go along, but I felt it would be in order, under the statement of the Rules Committee yesterday, when it was stated that they were not attempting to tie up title I, and as we have not yet reached title II and as we are reading the bill by paragraphs, to offer the amendment at this time.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on that particular question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The rule which was adopted yesterday and under which this bill is being considered, provides that amendments shall not be in order to any general appropriation bill, which are in conflict with the provisions of title II of this bill. Undoubtedly, in my opinion, that applies to this paragraph now under consideration; but no amendment which raises the amount to be appropriated up to the level to which the President, by exercise of the authority which is given him by the provisions of paragraph (c) on page 31 of this bill, is in violation of title II, provided it does not go beyond the figure of 100 percent, to which maximum the President is entitled, under the provisions of paragraph (c) on page 31, to raise the salaries of employees. So, therefore, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut is unquestionably in order.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the legislative provisions that were made in order by the special rule changed the basic salary rates for the next fiscal year from 100 percent to 90 percent; provided, however, that the President might, by Executive order, reinstate any portion of that 10 percent that the cost of living, as determined by the survey which he should make, would justify. Therefore, the legislation made in order by the rule, changes the basic salary rate from 100 percent to 90 percent. The rule provides that amendments may not be offered to this bill or to any other appropriation bill, which change title II, or which are in conflict with any of the legislative provisions in title II. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut reinserts the basic salary rate at 100 percent, and undertakes to appropriate money for it.

The amendment is objectionable for two reasons. I have thought of another reason why it is not in order. In the first place, if the legislative provisions embodied in title II are enacted, then the basic rate is 90 percent, and we have no right to appropriate the other 10 percent. It would be an unauthorized appropriation. So the amendment is not in order for two reasons.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman admits there is a paragraph in there which provides that, notwithstanding the anti-deficiency acts, it may be proper for the President, if he desires, to raise the rates, so that we are not appropriating on the basis of 90 percent; but I am not trying to fool anyone. All I am attempting here is to reinsert the amount and appropriate that amount, but the President still would have the power to make a reduction.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BULWINKLE). The Chair is ready to rule. It is within the memory of the Members of the House that yesterday the House passed House Resolution 217. Among other matters provided in this resolution there is this sentence:

> Amendments shall not be in order to any other section of the bill H.R 6663, or to any section of any general appropriation bill of the Seventy-third Congress, which would be in conflict with the provisions of title II of the bill H.R. 6663, as reported to the House.

In the opinion of the Chair, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Goss] is in conflict with the provisions of title II of H.R. 6663; and not being offered by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Funds available to the Office of the Alien Property Custodian for administrative expenses in the District of Columbia shall not be used for the purchase, maintenance, operation, and/or repair of any passenger automobile.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there is in this bill a provision for the National Advisory Aeronautics Board; and I am wondering if I may have unanimous consent to speak out of order on the subject of the flight to the Hawaiian Islands on yesterday and such other naval matters as I may have on my mind at the present moment.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unamious consent to proceed out of order for 5 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not for the reason that our irresistible friend from Illinois was promised 5 minutes by my colleague or myself and he was overlooked; but I hope the Membership of the House will not make further similar requests.

Mr. BRITTEN. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday Lt. Comdr. Knefler McGinnis, of the Navy, piloted a plane, accompanied by five other planes, all ordinary, everyday, Navy seaplanes, in the longest nonstop sea flight in the history of aviation. They flew 15 hours through darkness and through fogs, aiming at a speck in the Pacific Ocean that would be smaller than a pin point on a great big wall map of the Pacific Ocean.

The planes stood up beautifully. They covered 2,400 miles in a little more than 24 hours with not the slightest mishap enroute. Each plane carried five men—radio operators, mechanics, and otherwise ordinary enlisted men of the Navy. They were in communication with both sides of that part of the ocean all the time with their radio apparatus; and when they landed amid great excitement and were being decorated with Hawaiian flowers, and the Hawaiian leis which go around the neck, the first words of our lieutenant commander, in real naval modesty, were, "Do you mind if I light a cigarette?" They were just as unconcerned about the thing as though they were making a flight from Anacostia to Norfolk.

These six American planes, carrying 30 resolute Americans, showed great skill and perfect performance, and while it was in no sense a military maneuver, their flight was of tremendous military importance, for some day Honolulu and Pearl Harbor may be the key to the most important naval engagement in the history of the world. The following officers and enlisted men made the flight, while Commander Marc A. Mitscher went along in plane 10-P-1 and Lt. Comdr. George R. Henderson went along in plane 10-P-3 as observers:

Mr. Chairman, Rear Admiral Ernest J. King, United States Navy, Chief of the Bureau of Aeronautics, Navy Department, made the following statement on the arrival of Patrol Squadron 10-F at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, after its nonstop flight from San Francisco:

The Navy patrol planes which just successfully completed the 2,400-mile flight from San Francisco to Honolulu, thereby for a second time establishing a nonstop long-distance mass-formation flight record, were built for the Navy by the Consolidated Aircraft Co., of Buffalo, N.Y. The first of these planes were delivered to the Navy last spring, since which time they have been operating from the naval air station at Coco Solo, Canal Zone. The second division of six planes delivered to Coco Solo effected the transfer from Norfolk to Coco Solo without stop. It was these same planes which later flew from Coco Solo to San Diego, Calif., a distance of some 3,100 miles, making but one stop, and which now have made the splendid flight to Honolulu, their ultimate home operating station. Naturally, and justly, I am proud of the naval aviation officers who have participated in these flights. The successful accomplishment of the missions assigned reflects high credit to the Navy as a whole because of the high state of efficiency as regards both personnel and equipment that these accomplishments signify.

These patrol planes, built to specifications furnished by the Bureau of Aeronautics of the Navy Department, first of all are strong, seaworthy planes. This feature is most necessary in order that they may operate over the seas and land and take off with heavy loads in the open sea, even though this requirement is detrimental to the attainment of a high speed. Their mission in time of war is to scout and patrol vast areas to obtain information of the enemy, and to drop heavy bombs when the opportunity is presented. Powered with two Wright 600-horsepower air-cooled engines, they have a maximum speed of about 130 miles per hour and can carry sufficient gasoline to cruise 2,850 miles. Their total weight is over 23,000 pounds. A further development in this type of plane has been completed which will increase speed to about 140 miles per hour and instructions have been issued to effect these changes in all planes of this type. The normal crew is five, and the equipment carried includes navigational instruments, radio, emergency rations, a life raft, parachutes, and anchor gear.

They are fitted with three flexible machine guns, and as bombers can carry 2,000 pounds of bombs a distance of 2,000 miles.

This flight was undertaken as a service operation to prove the mobility of this squadron and to shift the base of operations from San Diego to Honolulu.

The following dispatch was sent to Lt. Comdr. Knefler McGinnis, United States Navy, by Rear Admiral King:

The Chief and officers of the Bureau of Aeronautics heartily congratulate commander VP Squadron 10 and his officers and men on the successful and workmanlike accomplishment of the nonstop flight from San Francisco to Honolulu, which is the longest formation nonstop flight in the history of aviation.

Mr. Chairman, Acting Secretary of the Navy Henry L. Roosevelt made the following statement on the arrival of Patrol Squadron 10-F at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, 24 hours from San Francisco, 2,400 statute miles:

I have sent them a "well done." The service is proud of them.

I note, too, that it is the longest recorded flight of planes in formation. The Navy has the next longest, too. That was Patrol Squadron 5-F from Hampton Roads to Coco Solo, in the Canal Zone, last year, 2,059 miles.

I have been looking over the reports as they came in, and they show a variety of flying conditions over the course, including some blind flying; but McGinnis went along hour after hour at economical-cruising speed and seems to have met nothing that he considered unusual.

That is what I like best about the whole thing. The flight was in no sense a stunt. They used our service planes, without alterations or additions in personnel or equipment and did an extraordinary thing in a routine way.

That is how I want the Navy to function.

The following congratulatory messages were sent:

To Rear Admiral Alfred W. Johnson, U.S.N., commander Base Force, United States Fleet, U.S.S. Wright:

Congratulations on successful flight Patrol Squadron 10-F. Proud that it was done with service planes under service conditions.

HENRY L. ROOSEVELT.

To Lt. Comdr. Knefler McGinnis, U.S.N., commanding VP Squadron:

Well done. The Navy is proud of your squadron. My congratulations and warm personal regards to officers and men.

HENRY L. ROOSEVELT.

It happens that this flight occurred at a moment when, I observe by this morning's papers, probably the most distinguished ranking officer in the Japanese Navy made a public statement which I shall put in the RECORD also. It is very short, but the subject of it, to my mind, is startling.

Now, anything I may say, will of course, not be intended to arouse any feeling against Japan. I have traveled in Japan and know their people well. I am quite satisfied that Admiral Suetsugu is not talking for his Emperor; and I am satisfied he is not talking for the people of Japan, who have a very high regard for us, and we have a very kindly feeling for them. But let me quote what he says. The reason I am calling attention to this now is because Pearl Harbor, in our own Hawaiian Islands, may some day be our Heligoland; it may some day be the point upon which the life of our Nation depends. It is a very strategic point. I will read a copyrighted news dispatch of yesterday from Tokyo by James R. Young of the International News Service.

TOKYO, January 11.—Japan is already preparing for war with the United States, and the time is past when the white race can consider itself superior to the yellow, according to Vice Admiral Nobumasa Suetsugu, commander in chief of the imperial combined fleets of Japan.

Vice Admiral Suetsugu, noted submarine expert and authority on naval strategy, whose followers include the strong Japanese group opposed to the London Naval Treaty, is qualified for selection as navy minister in the event of war and is the man with whom the fate of the Empire is likely to be entrusted in the event of emergency.

HE CHARGES SCHEME

In an interview appearing in the publication, Gendai, Suetsugu not only drew a pessimistic picture of the future of world peace but also charged that resumption of diplomatic relations between the United States and Soviet Russia involved a military scheme to surround Japan. He said:

"A frontal clash between the two great Pacific Fleets would seriously damage both sides.

"It is likely that the United States would use every means to surround Japan. We must prepare for it, and in fact we are already preparing for it.

"The Stimson doctrine (nonrecognition of territories gained by force, promulgated after Japan's seizure of Manchukuo) remains unchanged despite the Democratic administration in Washington.

"We do not believe that diplomacy will settle the issue and we are determined to prepare for the worst possibilities of an economic and political clash.

"Undue fears are not entertained regarding our Navy's status. Nothing can frighten our nation if we are determined to fight to the last man.

"OUR DEFENSES FAVORED

"The geographical formation favors our defenses. No country in the world has a submarine fleet superior to that of Japan.

"The relationship between the United States and Soviet Russia involves a scheme to surround Japan for a military purpose, as proof of which I would point out that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is completing preparations for war and concentrating troops and a strong force of bombing planes in the Far East."

At this point in the interview Admiral Suetsugu digressed to furnish a geographical summary of Japan's task in defending her shores against the combined fleets of the world. He continued:

"If we waged an aggressive attack our task would be most difficult, but defense would be easy.

"HE SCOUTS THREATS

"The time has passed when the powers can force us with threats. Any country scheming with such a psychology will find itself greatly mistaken.

"If the whites consider themselves superior, we must fight them. In the problem of whites versus yellows lies the greatest obstacle to smoothing out Japan's diplomatic relations.

"World envy parallels the steady rise of the Japanese in world affairs. Heretofore the whites felt themselves privileged.

"The entire issues involved transcend diplomacy. Anglo-Japanese competition in cotton is responsible for today's deplorable diplomacy. Likewise America's eagerness for China trade as well as our own ideas for the development of Manchuria place agreements between America and Japan in the darkest light.

TRADE WAR INEVITABLE

"Heretofore the United States sold heavy industrial products here, while we traded cotton and materials. As long as the different lines of trade did not clash, that situation prevailed, but Japan's cotton and yarn business is not our only merchandise now.

"We build warships. It is not difficult to produce airplanes and automobiles. And a trade war between Japan and America is inevitable.

"The economic clash in the China market is similar to the situation there between Britain and Germany prior to the World War, which created a 10-year economic clash before the war itself.

"Prior to the Washington Conference Japan was quiet. America has prepared for war on the eve of the 1935 conference. America better prepare herself by concentrating her vessels in the San Francisco zone.

INSISTS ON UNITY

"I heartily support War Minister Araki that we cannot wage a victorious war unless we are united spiritually and in national defense. Having a fighting machine does not suffice. The whole nation must support us.

"Some are anxious over our defenses from the viewpoint of the possibility of an air attack and over the alleged inferiority of the Japanese Navy compared with that of the United States.

"I do not entertain such fears. Our combined air force is sufficiently strong and numerically equal to others. Three air fleets may surround Japan and attack from Formosa, from the sea, and from the north. I anticipate the presence of a great enemy fleet in the Pacific with a superior air force.

"The powers are bringing pressure for higher tariffs. This is an indirect blockade. If all join, we are isolated.

"Such facts as are developing will probably be precipitated in 1935, when the powers are scheduled to discuss naval matters. If the powers limit the defense rights of Japan, there will be no concession on the subject of armament equality.

WARNS OF "SNATCHINGS"

"The year 1935 coincides with our actual withdrawal from the League of Nations. (Editor's note: Japan's resignation, tendered last year, is not effective for 2 years.)

"We will not return the mandated islands only at the cost of war, and if the powers attempt to snatch them from Japan a clash is inevitable.

"There is a strong possibility that the powers will campaign to drive Japan out of Manchuria as they forced us out of Shantung at the time of the Washington Conference.

"Some people say that the naval treaty brings peace. I do not subscribe to that view, as a mutually satisfactory treaty has not been concluded, and any time that a naval treaty does not bring peace it does not reduce financial burdens.

"If the occidentals will throw off their assumed superiority and regard all human beings, irrespective of color, as their equals, then there will be real world peace."

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. When the highest ranking officer in the Japanese Navy says that his country is preparing for war with the United States, in the belief that a world conflict between the white and yellow races is inevitable as a means of settling once and for all time the contention that the white race is the superior one on this earth, he certainly is going out of his way to provoke world-wide sentiment against the present military dictatorship in Japan.

Admitting that Admiral Suetsugu is a submarine expert and an authority on naval strategy, it must be equally evident that his knowledge of American diplomacy and America's wishes is far from even ordinary understanding. In dealing with foreign powers the American Government is almost childishly frank; it lays all of its cards on the table, and as a result, is usually outwitted by the Asiatics and Europeans, whose very foundation of diplomacy is deceit.

In order to arouse indignation at home, Admiral Suetsugu says that Soviet Russia and the United States are involved in a scheme to militarily surround Japan, and with that horrible situation confronting his country he calls upon his people to be united, spiritually as well as in national defense, because only war and not diplomacy can settle these grave issues. He lays great stress upon the superiority of the Japanese submarine fleet.

When the Japanese admiral says that his country will never return the mandated islands in the Pacific, which are a constant menace to Hawaii, our Heligoland, and when he calls for the building of more warships and airplanes, he is deliberately throwing down a challenge which the Roosevelt administration and those in charge of the national defense cannot fail to understand, and the quicker the Congress authorizes the construction of the 102 warships of various categories, which will place our Navy on treaty strength with the fleets of Japan and England, the better it will be for our national well-being. A building program carried over a 5-year period would cost less than $70,000,000 a year and would be the greatest insurance policy for peace in the entire world. If Japan ever strikes at us, it will be at a moment of our unpreparedness, just as she did the Russian fleet. There is no national policy of such importance as the maintenance of an American Navy that is second to none in efficiency and hitting power.

My attention today has been called to some war pictures that are being used now by certain of the larger newspapers of the country, New York, Washington—this happens to be the Chicago Herald-Examiner which I hold in my hand. No one can look at these pictures without cringing. They are so-called "uncensored" pictures that are coming out now for the first time throughout the United States.

We could better appropriate $1,000,000,000 overnight, if need be, for national defense, rather than take one chance in a thousand of a recurrence of what happened on the other side during the World War. One thousand million dollars would be cheap. You cannot estimate the value of a proper national defense; nobody can.

Our position was very finely expressed by President Roosevelt the other day:

A peaceful desire with every nation on earth.

Let us not forget that despite the European war debts we are still the greatest Nation on earth; we have got more gold than any nation on earth; we have got more potentialities available—sound potentialities—than any nation on earth; and we would be a great prize for a surprise attack.

Stating it in terms of preparedness, not for war but as an insurance policy for ourselves, it will be cheap at 10 times a thousand million.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman will recall the fact that we have all of these blessings, even under a Democratic administration.

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes; and I thank God that we have all of these blessings, even under a Democratic administration.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRITTEN. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. In view of the statement of the Japanese admiral, I should like to ask the distinguished member of the Naval Affairs Committee what he thinks of the plan of the Navy Department to permanently remove the fleet from Pacific waters to Atlantic waters?

Mr. BRITTEN. I will say to the gentleman that I do not think that will ever be done.

Mr. MOTT. I hope the gentleman is right.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Civil Service Commission, $1,476,000.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Last summer there came to my attention a number of announcements from the Civil Service Commission covering examinations. I went over those announcements and found to my great suprise that the Civil Service Commission was placing an age limit in those announcements that practically eliminated everyone over 35 years of age, with an exception or two that went up to 40.

I took the matter up with the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission immediately and demanded to know why the United States Government was going to deprive everyone over 40 years of age of the opportunity of securing a position with the Government; I told him that if the United States Government was going to lead the way, it might have a detrimental effect in industry, and that it was bad enough the way we were going now. A man over 40 has a hard time getting a position, and that is especially so when seeking a job with railroads. The reply I received was to the effect that the appointing officers were declining to appoint anyone over 40 years of age when the names were certified.

Getting nowhere with the Civil Service Commission, I took the matter up with the President and the next afternoon it was discussed at the Cabinet meeting. Mrs. Perkins, Secretary of Labor, was selected by the President to go into the matter and adjust it. As a result, the age limits were changed. They were increased.

It was my purpose to offer an amendment to this bill if something had not been done, but the age limit in all examinations has been increased. They finally put it up as far as 53. I do not know why they stopped at 53 unless it was because I told the Chairman of the Commission that I was 53 and thought I was still good.

I realize now no amendment is necessary, because a few days ago I received an announcement from the Civil Service Commission covering examination for chief statistician, and anybody under 73 can get in on that examination. I received another one this morning from the Civil Service Commission covering examinations for associate social economist and assistant social economist. I do not know what their duties are, but anyone under 70 years can get in on those examinations. That meets my objection.

My purpose in rising now is to call this to the attention of the Committee on the Civil Service and request that the members go into this matter and find out why appointive officers take it upon themselves when three names are submitted to eliminate a person simply because of age. A man or woman should not be eliminated from appointment to this Government service solely on account of age when within the age limit. I hope that the Civil Service Committee will make some investigation along this line. It will be beneficial.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to ask the gentleman what right the Government has to eliminate any man or woman because of age unless and until that Government stands ready to pension him because of his age?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They should not have any such right at all. That is what I am trying to prevent. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. I notice this increases the appropriation for the Civil Service Commission to $400,000, $200,000 to be made immediately available. I would like to ask the chairman just why that is necessary at this time.

Mr. WOODRUM. It is necessary because of the added duties put on the Civil Service Commission by many of these emergency organizations, and for the further reason that we cut it too much last year.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand it is on account of these emergency organizations?

Mr. WOODRUM. That has something to do with it, I understand.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand that any of the people in these organizations came under civil service.

Mr. WOODRUM. Many of them were under civil service and the Civil Service Commission was asked to furnish many lists to assist in recruiting the employees.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand, all Civil Service requirements were waived.

Mr. WOODRUM. Not all of them.

Mr. SNELL. And from the information I have been able to gather, I had supposed they were not appointed by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WOODRUM. In the first place, I may say to the gentleman from New York that we cut the Civil Service Commission too much last year. We arbitrarily sliced the appropriation too heavily last year and that accounts for the $200,000 deficiency.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell me, or was it brought out in the hearings before his subcommittee, how many additional employees of the Government have been put on in Washington during the last year?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman means in all the departments?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Including the emergency departments?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. I have not that information.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman such information with regard to the regular establishments of the Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. Those figures are in the hearings.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman does not recall them?

Mr. WOODRUM. No.

Mr. SNELL. But I take it from what the gentleman has said that quite a number of the people in these emergency establishments are under civil service?

Mr. WOODRUM. Some of them are under civil service and a great many others were furnished by the Civil Service Commission. For instance, if they wanted stenographers, they took the names from lists of the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SNELL. I cannot see any special reason why they should need any more money than they have had before, because the Government, in its regular establishments, as I understand it, is not putting on any additional help, and if this is true why is there such a large increase of appropriation needed at this time?

Mr. WOODRUM. The testimony before the subcommittee shows that the civil-service employees, on the average, got about a 30-percent cut and while they were on administrative furlough they were there at work. Therefore they got not only a 15-percent cut, but in addition to that they had an administrative furlough and continued working long hours voluntarily to try to make up for the lack of funds in the appropriation of last year. As the gentleman will remember, our distinguished friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] insisted on making this cut last year. I think the gentleman's amendment was adopted.

Mr. SNELL. At that time we did not think there was going to be much use for the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. WOODRUM. And in that respect the gentleman was misinformed.

Mr. TABER. We were advised by the Civil Service Commission and everyone else a year ago that they were not having any examinations and were not filling any vacancies. I do not know of there being any large number of examinations for anything except specialists such as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] has referred to, although they have been increasing the number of employees, especially in the special agencies right along.

Mr. SNELL. Do such examinations as they are holding for common laborers for the Tennessee Valley Authority come under the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes; and they were called upon to perform a great deal of work with reference to the 30-year retirement provision. All these separations from the service and reductions of personnel had to go through the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that in order for a man to get a job as a common laborer he has to take an examination by the Civil Service Commission of this Government?

Mr. WOODRUM. They call it a Civil Service examination. It is a form they go through and is not an examination in the sense that they ask him about Greek mythology, astronomy, and things of that sort. There is a physical examination for unskilled labor.

Mr. TABER. I wonder if the Civil Service Commission is able to determine the qualifications of a common laborer by any paper that he may send up to the office here in Washington.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, many Members of the House who are interested in the labor situation have come to me today and have asked me what I thought was the best parliamentary procedure to follow in order to get some results for the benefit of labor and the Government employees under this bill and, if we want to put it in that way, indirectly, to get benefits for the veterans. I said I believed the best thing to do under the circumstances was to vote to recommit the bill and send it back to the committee.

I understand the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, the Chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations in charge of this bill, said in his statement this afternoon that if it were recommitted and went back to the committee, the committee would bring it right back again in exactly the same shape because a majority of the committee were in favor of that. However, my experience here, after 11 years, has been that if the House of Representatives shows decisively by their vote that they want something done, there is always a method of having it done.

If a majority of the House want this bill recommitted, show they are dissatisfied with gag rule and with this procedure, the Appropriations Committee and the Rules Committee and the steering committee, and all combined, will find a method of bringing in a bill that will be satisfactory to those who are friendly to labor and friendly to the veterans.

So I say to those who have asked me today that I believe the best procedure, in order to help the Government employees and, indirectly, help the veterans, is to vote to recommit this bill; and if no one else who has priority to me offers the motion to recommit, I am going to offer such a motion myself. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Employees' compensation fund: For the payment of compensation provided by "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes", approved September 7, 1916 (U.S.C., title 5, sec. 785), including medical examinations, traveling and other expenses, and loss of wages payable to employees under sections 21 and 22; all services, appliances, and supplies provided by section 9 as amended, including payments to Army and Navy hospitals; the transportation and burial expenses provided by sections 9 and 11; and advancement of costs for the enforcement of recoveries provided in sections 26 and 27 where necessary, accruing during the fiscal year 1935 or in prior fiscal years, $3,987,900.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. I understand there are probably 30,000 additional governmental employees directly under the provisions of this act. That number probably will be 50,000 by the time the fiscal year 1935 starts on the 1st of next July. I regard it quite important. The provision for 1934 was made a year ago when we were not expecting any such increase. The appropriation then was $3,810,000, and now it is $3,987,000, an increase of $160,000, but not nearly so large as the percentage of the increase of employees. I want to ask the gentleman if he believes the failure to appropriate more in this item will create a deficiency?

Mr. WOODRUM. I will say that these figures were based on the best estimate the Department could make. I do not think there will be any deficiency.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman knows that General Hines stated that he expected his estimates would be increased 25 percent.

Mr. WOODRUM. General Hines stated that he thought he could live within the appropriation, and most of the departments will. I think it is best to give them an incentive to do it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Federal Power Commission, $277,303.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask the chairman what is the cause of the increased appropriation for the Power Commission? What has occurred up to the present time that it needs more money?

Mr. WOODRUM. The accounting work of the Federal Power Commission has been behind all the time. In the last 2 or 3 years they have been behind, and $20,000 of the increase is deficiency from last years' appropriation.

Mr. SNELL. What is the amount of the permanent appropriation outside of what is carried in this bill?

Mr. GOSS. It is $73,275.

Mr. WOODRUM. As I understand it, there is an appropriation out of the license fees that they are permitted to use, but that is not an appropriation by Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a permanent appropriation?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think so. If it is so regarded, the $742,000 goes to the reclamation fund.

Mr. SNELL. When we were considering this item last year the question was raised about several new investigations that the Power Commission intended to take up. Have all those investigations been started?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is not thinking of the Federal Trade Commission, is he?

Mr. SNELL. No; the Federal Power Commission.

Mr. WOODRUM. My recollection is that that was with reference to the Federal Trade Commission. Four hundred thousand dollars has been spent for making a general power survey of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all printing and binding for the General Accounting Office, including monthly and annual editions of selected decisions of the Comptroller General of the United States, $59,000.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. How much has been transferred to the General Accounting Office out of other special appropriations for the fiscal year 1934 and the fiscal year 1935 which really ought to be in this appropriation?

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the gentleman's question correctly, the General Accounting Office got approximately $502,000 from the National Recovery Administration to take care of special work that the Accounting Office was called upon to do on account of the recovery program.

Mr. TABER. How much of that is applicable to 1934 and how much to 1935?

Mr. WOODRUM. It was not apportioned between those 2 years. It is available to the end of the fiscal year 1935.

Mr. TABER. Did the committee find out in its hearings anything about any other contemplated transfers?

Mr. WOODRUM. Of funds?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. None that came to the attention of the committee.

Mr. TABER. Does the gentleman feel that this appropriation will be sufficient to take care of the General Accounting Office without a deficiency?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think it would have been sufficient had it not been for the recent Executive order bringing all these other independent establishments under the General Accounting Office. I understand there is now being presented to the Budget, and there will be a request made in the first deficiency appropriation bill for additional funds to take care of these added duties placed on the General Accounting Office.

Mr. TABER. Has the gentleman any idea how much that will be?

Mr. WOODRUM. No; I have not.

Mr. TABER. It is quite a substantial item?

Mr. WOODRUM. I should imagine it will be.

Mr. TABER. Because it practically doubles the accounting work of the Government.

Mr. WOODRUM. But I think it will be money well spent.

Mr. TABER. I agree with the gentleman, but at the same time I think the House ought to have a picture of what is going on and what is being done. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Locomotive inspection: For all authorized expenditures under the provisions of the act of February 17, 1911, entitled "An act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto" (U.S.C., title 45, sec. 22), as amended by the act of March 4, 1915, extending "the same powers and duties with respect to all parts and appurtenances of the locomotives and tender" (U.S.C., title 45, sec. 30), and amendment of June 7, 1924 (U.S.C., title 45, sec. 27), providing for the appointment from time to time by the Interstate Commerce Commission of not more than 15 inspectors in addition to the number authorized in the first paragraph of section 4 of the act of 1911 (U.S.C., title 45, sec. 26), and the amendment of June 27, 1930 (U.S.C., Supp. VI, title 45, secs. 24, 26), including such legal, technical, stenographic, and clerical help as the business of the offices of the chief inspector and his two assistants may require and for traveling expenses, $449,606, of which amount not to exceed $67,500 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. On page 27 of this bill there is an appropriation of $284,789,984, which is the amount of money for pensions. Of course we are not going to be able as a matter of legislation to increase that amount and then provide what the money must be used for. We are going to be confronted with the proposition that that is adding legislation to an appropriation bill. But when we come to that point I am going to offer an amendment to increase that appropriation exactly $46,000,000. That is the exact amount of money which would be required to restore Spanish-American War veterans' pensions, less 25 percent, which is in exact keeping with the Connolly amendment of last spring and the Cutting-Steiwer amendment of last spring. In other words, it will be restoring to every Spanish-American War veteran not less than 75 percent of what the Spanish-American War veterans and their widows were receiving prior to the President's regulation under the Economy Act.

I believe that is just what the country wants. These veterans have no opportunity to establish their service connection. In many instances their doctors are dead. Next, the Army did not keep good records. Their comrades are gone. Some concessions must be made with the Spanish-American War veterans on the proposition of service connection. I am in sympathy as a matter of broad principle with confining pensions to service connection, but distinctions must be made when we undertake to put it into effect. In cases of disease you cannot apply it with accuracy, particularly so with the Spanish-American War veterans, because they probably suffered more from disease than any other army per capita, and considering the fact that the records are gone, that 30 years have elapsed, common justice demands that their pensions be lumped off in some manner more leniently than they are now being administered. Instead of reducing these pensions to $15 a month, a flat 25-percent reduction is all that should be made under any circumstances. That meets every reasonable requirement of economy, and I believe it will meet with the approval of the Spanish-American War veterans. I never heard any clamor to reduce the Spanish-American War pensions in the first instance. If this amount of money is appropriated, it simply means that Congress has said to the President of the United States and to the people of the United States that we want these Spanish-American War veterans to receive this compensation which is now appropriated, and with the rules surrounding this legislation and with the utter impossibility to bring such legislation out later, I think the practical thing to do is for Congress to go ahead and make the appropriation. When I offer that amendment at that time I hope it will receive the support of the Membership of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee whether there has been any reduction in the appropriations made for the Locomotive Inspection Department of the Interstate Commerce Commission under the appropriation of last year.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; there has been no reduction in that appropriation.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, salaries and expenses, Interstate Commerce Commission, $5,305,970.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Have there been any transfers to the appropriations for the Interstate Commerce Commission of any kind from any other Bureau, Department, or agency?

Mr. WOODRUM. Not that I know of.

Mr. TABER. Are there any in contemplation?

Mr. WOODRUM. None that I know of.

Mr. TABER. Is it believed that the appropriation for the Interstate Commerce Commission will be sufficient to carry that through without a deficiency?

Mr. WOODRUM. In my judgment it is.

Mr. TABER. With reference to the valuation of the property of carriers, are we not reaching nearly the stage where that can more or less be reduced and done away with?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman knows, of course, we have made a very substantial reduction in that appropriation.

Mr. TABER. I appreciate that.

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, the repeal of the recapture clause very seriously affects the work of the valuation department, yet aside from the recapture clause, the Interstate Commerce Commission is required to keep these valuations current, for the purpose of stock issues. It is estimated it will cost $1,000,000 a year to keep that work current.

Mr. TABER. But that is all that is being carried on, just keeping the work current?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is all that is being carried on.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Interstate Commerce Commission, $5,430,970.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman a question. I notice there is an appropriation of $1,052,700 for the valuation of properties and securing information concerning stocks and bonds and other securities of the railroads. During the last 10 years Congress has authorized the expenditure of large amounts of money in order that the Interstate Commerce Commission may make this valuation. Why is it necessary to have $1,052,000 appropriated this year? Is that to carry out the provisions of the so-called "Rayburn Act", relative to holding companies, and so forth, of the railroads?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Rayburn Act does not have anything to do with it. The basic law requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to value properties of common carriers for two purposes: One, for rate-making purposes and to keep that valuation current; second, the recapture provisions of the act. We have now repealed the recapture provisions and the primary valuation of all carriers has been completed, but the basic law requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to police the accounts and not to accept the statements which the carriers send in each year as to the condition of the property but to personally investigate them and audit them. The gentleman knows, of course, considering the vast holdings of the railroads of the United States, what a great task that is. Until the Congress ever changes the law it will require something like $1,000,000 a year to keep that valuation current.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. That is the point I am trying to make. For many years the Congress has appropriated a million dollars for the valuation of the property of these carriers. I am wondering how much longer Congress must make appropriations for this purpose. Is it necessary each year for the Interstate Commerce Commission to make a revaluation?

Mr. WOODRUM. Congress has said that it is. The Congress has said that it wanted the Interstate Commerce Commission to keep those valuations current, and, until the Congress changes its mind, I suppose we will have to provide them with facilities to do that work.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The point I had in mind was that there is not much change in the property values of the railroads after the valuation has once been made. Surely the Interstate Commerce Commission has had plenty of time to value those properties.

Mr. WOODRUM. They have made the primary valuations, but this work is kept up to date. It is for policing the accounts and auditing the annual statements that the railroads send in.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, to ask the chairman why the increase of a quarter of a million dollars in the total for the Interstate Commerce Commission. Will the gentleman give us a brief explanation of that?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is in the Bureau of Accounts. That is the Bureau that has to do with the basic work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. We had full hearings on that.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, $726,492.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman a question. I understand there have been quite substantial transfers to this appropriation from the outside for the fiscal year 1934. Could the gentleman tell the committee something about that?

Mr. WOODRUM. There was a substantial transfer of funds to the National Advisory Committee for the purpose of enabling them to repair the damage done at their plant at Langley Field by the two storms which almost ruined it. Two hundred and forty-seven thousand dollars of Public Works money was transferred for the purpose of restoration of that property.

Mr. TABER. I understand that only $48,000 represented damage, and the rest of it, about $200,000, represented new construction and additions which had not been allowed by the Congress.

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, I did not so understand. I do not know what information the gentleman has.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. The information will be found on page 197 of the hearings. I think it confirms the statement which the gentleman from New York has just made.

Mr. TABER. Is it to be presumed that this appropriation is sufficient to take care of the expenses of this particular activity without creating a deficiency?

Mr. WOODRUM. That is the intention of the committee in all of these appropriations, but whether it will be or not only the future can determine.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUERTO RICAN HURRICANE RELIEF COMMISSION

To enable the Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission to continue collection and administration of moneys due the United States on account of loans made under the joint resolutions approved December 21, 1928 (45 Stat. 1067), and January 22, 1930 (46 Stat. 57), not to exceed $50,000 of any unobligated balances of appropriations made by authority of those joint resolutions, including repayment of principal and/or payments of interest on such loans, is hereby made available for administrative expenses during the fiscal year 1935: Provided, That otherwise proper payments made or to be made prior to July 1, 1934, for administrative or other necessary expenses incident to the refinancing of old loans and collecting of loans, shall not be questioned because of the nonavailability of the loan appropriations for such expenses: Provided further, That no part of any unexpended balances available for expenditure by the Commission may be used for making any new loans after January 15, 1934.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish the chairman of the committee would give us some information relative to this Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission; what the financial situation of the commission, how many men are employed in connection with it, and what this $50,000 additional expense is to be used for?

Mr. WOODRUM. The Puerto Rican Hurricane Relief Commission, as the gentleman knows, was a commission set up to afford relief necessary on account of the Puerto Rican hurricane. They have made a lot of loans, and they are collecting the loans. I understand it will cost us about $50,000 to collect $12,000.

Mr. SNELL. If this is really costing us more than we are getting for it, why would it not be better to abolish it and call them home and quit? Would we not be saving money by so doing?

Mr. WOODRUM. Well, it is a difficult question. The committee considered that matter very thoroughly. There are a great many additional loans that the officials on that commission think they can collect.

Undoubtedly they are spending too much money.

Mr. SNELL. If it is impossible for them to collect this money why should we not cut down the force and leave but one or two men down there? How many men are there now?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think there are 12.

Mr. SNELL. If they are not doing very much business or collecting very much money, why should we not cut the organization down to two or three men, leave them there to collect what they can and bring the rest of them home, saving as much of this expense as possible?

Mr. WOODRUM. The committee felt that the commission having been set up by Congress should have its needs provided for and that it was the duty of Congress to authorize sufficient appropriations for them to continue this work.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says it is a function of Congress to create a board and commissions and to appropriate for them, but under the gag rule of yesterday we are so absolutely tied up we cannot do anything about it when we find the cost of carrying them on out of proportion to the results obtained.

Mr. WOODRUM. No. The rule adopted yesterday has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman said Congress set up this commission. Why cannot Congress do away with it?

Mr. WOODRUM. The rule adopted yesterday does not affect this in the slightest.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SNELL. I yield.

Mr. TABER. Last year they collected only $23,000, and to collect this $23,000 they spent about $120,000. That is good business. If such a program were followed by an ordinary business house it would go into bankruptcy.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to cut this appropriation from $50,000 to $25,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SNELL: Page 18, line 22, strike out "$50,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$25,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. I accept the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, we have just passed an amendment cutting this appropriation to $25,000. As a matter of information I ask the chairman of the committee if I understood him correctly to state they had about $12,000 down there to collect?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. I said that last year they collected about $12,000. We all recognize, of course, that last year was a bad year down there as well as elsewhere. However, large amounts have been loaned down there by the Government and there is a service there to be performed. It would be unfortunate indeed to cut out the appropriation entirely. It is all right, however, to cut it down, as I have indicated.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. What is the approximate amount still owed us?

Mr. WOODRUM. Five million seven hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. It seems rather strange. We have been battling for 13 years in the State of Minnesota to secure some kind of relief from disastrous fires in the woods of northern Minnesota, fires started by Government-owned railroads, fires which destroyed the homes of thousands of people in that section of the State. In fact the total destruction was estimated by the Government as being something over $13,000,000. These people have been living in tents out-of-doors since that time and we have not been able to get a penny to help out in the situation. It seems, however, that every time California has an earthquake, or somebody else has any trouble, the Government rushes to help them out. I am not opposed to it; I am not objecting to it, but it does seem strange that when such a calamity as that which hit us in northern Minnesota occurs in our State we can get no help. As I said, these fires destroyed homes and property to the extent of $13,000,000. These fires were caused by Government-owned railroads. They occurred at a time when the Government had taken over the railroads of the country and it does seem our people should be given a little consideration in the matter, but they have been defeated in all their efforts to try to collect this money. Bills have been introduced for the purpose in the House.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. FORD. Will the gentleman inform us when these fires occurred?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. They occurred during the period the Government was running the railroads. There has been a bill continuously before Congress, and it even reached the floor of the House on one occasion, but without avail. The matter has been battled for 13 years. It seems but fair they should be given some consideration.

Mr. FORD. I should like to help the gentleman, but I should like to know when this occurred and other facts.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. The fire was in June 1918. Yet we cannot get that bill out of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Astrophysical Observatory: For maintenance of the Astrophysical Observatory, under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including assistants, purchase of books, periodicals, and apparatus, making necessary observations in high altitudes, repairs and alterations of buildings, preparation of manuscripts, drawings and illustrations, traveling expenses, and miscellaneous expenses, $27,988.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. According to my view of this appropriation it has been increased enough to take care of the 5-percent increase in salary contemplated; and I understand there have been very substantial sums of money spent on it by other activities. I wish the chairman would tell us something about this, because the people ought to know what is being done.

Mr. WOODRUM. Is the gentleman referring to the Smithsonian Institution?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Does the gentleman mean public works, civil works, and work done under the national recovery program?

Mr. TABER. Anything that enters into the picture.

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course the gentleman knows the Smithsonian Institution is endowed with funds aside from those the Government appropriates?

Mr. TABER. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman is not speaking of that?

Mr. TABER. No. I mean the public works, the civil works—things of this nature.

Mr. WOODRUM. It has received funds for public works and civil works, but I do not have at hand a list of the items. If the gentleman has them I would be pleased if he supplied them.

Mr. TABER. I understand 130 people have been working here, probably a doubling of the entire force; they have been working for the last 3 months. It looks as though a lot of this current work was being done by the outside agencies, and I am wondering if this Institution needs all the funds carried in the bill in view of the fact that appropriations are being made by other agencies.

Mr. WOODRUM. I may say to the gentleman from New York that in the case of the Smithsonian Institution Congress has been very slow to keep pace with the natural increase in the need for appropriations. For several years we have held them down. It is very likely that had not some of these emergency funds been used for work at the Smithsonian Institution the money would have to be provided for anyway by regular appropriations.

By unanimous consent the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries and expenses of the United States Tariff Commission, including purchase and exchange of labor-saving devices, the purchase of professional and scientific books, law books, books of reference, gloves and other protective equipment for photostat and other machine operators, rent in the district of Columbia and elsewhere, subscriptions to newspapers and periodicals, and contract stenographic reporting services, as authorized by sections 330 to 341 of the Tariff Act of 1930, approved June 17, 1930 (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 19, secs. 1330–1341), $826,398, of which amount not to exceed $713,340 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia; not to exceed $2,500 for expenses, except membership fees, of attendance at meetings concerned with subjects under investigation by the Commission; and not to exceed $7,500 for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 5, sec. 118a), but not to exceed $720 may be so used for any one person: Provided, That the Commission may procure supplies and services without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U.S.C., title 41, sec. 5) when the aggregate amount involved does not exceed $50: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay the salary of any member of the United States Tariff Commission who shall hereafter participate in any proceedings under sections 336, 337, and 338 of the Tariff Act of 1930, wherein he or any member of his family has any special, direct, and pecuniary interest, or in which he has acted as attorney or special representative.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WOODRUM from the committee: Page 22, line 6, strike out the amount "$713,344" and insert in lieu thereof "$725,000."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the amendment suggested by the committee does not in any way affect the total amount of the appropriation. It merely changes the amount the Tariff Commission is authorized to spend in the District of Columbia. This is an amendment which I am confident the committee would have reported in the bill had it not been inadvertently overlooked. I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] has no objection to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if there are any transfers to this appropriation from any other fund?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not understand that the Tariff Commission received any money from any other source.

Mr. TABER. Is this going to be sufficient, in view of the notice we have had, to carry this Commission through the next fiscal year without a deficiency?

Mr. WOODRUM. I think it will.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Tariff Commission, $840,898.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in connection with several of these appropriations that there is an amount of $720 set aside to be used by one person for light, heat, water, and various other things. May I inquire whether these men who are getting salaries from the Tariff Commission cannot pay for their own light, heat, and water?

Mr. WOODRUM. Those are allowances made to men engaged in the Foreign Service and are authorized by law.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Seven hundred and twenty dollars annually?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Administration, medical, hospital, and domiciliary services: For all salaries and expenses of the Veterans' Administration, including the expenses of maintenance and operation of medical, hospital, and domiciliary services of the Veterans' Administration, in carrying out the duties, powers, and functions devolving upon it pursuant to the authority contained in the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to consolidate and coordinate governmental activities affecting war veterans", approved July 3, 1930 (U.S.C., sup. VI, title 38, secs. 11–11f), and any and all laws for which the Veterans' Administration is now or may hereafter be charged with administering, $76,649,907: Provided, That not to exceed $3,500 of this amount shall be available for expenses, except membership fees, of employees detailed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of medical science and annual national conventions of organized war veterans: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available also for personal services and rentals in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, including traveling expenses; examination of estimates of appropriations in the field, including actual expenses of subsistence or per diem allowance in lieu thereof; for expenses incurred in packing, crating, drayage, and transportation of household effects and other property, not exceeding in any one case 5,000 pounds, of employees when transferred from one official station to another for permanent duty and when specifically authorized by the Administrator; furnishing and laundering of such wearing apparel as may be prescribed for employees in the performance of their official duties; purchase and exchange of law books, books of reference, periodicals, and newspapers; for passenger-carrying and other motor vehicles, including purchase, maintenance, repair, and operation of same, including not more than two passenger automobiles for general administrative use of the Central Office in the District of Columbia; and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to utilize Government-owned automotive equipment in transporting children of Veterans' Administration employees located at isolated stations to and from school under such limitations as he may by regulation prescribe; and notwithstanding any provisions of law to the contrary, the Administrator is authorized to expend during the fiscal year 1935 not to exceed $4,000 for actuarial services pertaining to the Government life insurance fund and the civil-service-retirement fund, to be obtained by contract, without obtaining competition, at such rates of compensation as he may determine to be reasonable; for allotment and transfer to the Public Health Service, the War, Navy, and Interior Departments, for disbursement by them under the various headings of their applicable appropriations, of such amounts as are necessary for the care and treatment of beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration, including minor repairs and improvements of existing facilities under their jurisdiction necessary to such care and treatment; for expenses incidental to the maintenance and operation of farms; for recreational articles and facilities at institutions maintained by the Veterans' Administration; for administrative expenses incidental to securing employment for war veterans; for funeral, burial, and other expenses incidental thereto for beneficiaries of the Veterans' Administration accruing during the fiscal year 1935 or prior fiscal years:

Provided further, That the appropriations herein made for the care and maintenance of veterans in hospitals or homes under the jurisdiction of the Veterans' Administration shall be available for the purchase of tobacco to be furnished, subject to such regulations as the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall prescribe, to veterans receiving hospital treatment or domiciliary care in Veterans' Administration hospitals or homes: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be available for continuing aid to State or Territorial homes for the support of disabled volunteer soldiers and sailors, in conformity with the act approved August 27, 1888 (U.S.C., title 24, sec. 134), as amended, for those veterans eligible for admission to Veterans' Administration facilities for domiciliary care.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have asked for this time in order to protest against what seems to be a habitual practice on the part of the Veterans' Administration of overstating the cost of veterans' legislation, veterans' benefits, and the prospective cost of veterans' benefits proposed.

I recall that about a year ago it was generally narrated in Washington that General Hines had appeared before the joint committee investigating veterans' affairs and had estimated that at the peak the veterans' laws already in force would call for an expenditure of around $3,000,000,000 a year. This was later said to be corrected by him. But throughout the whole fight affecting the economy bill last year this figure was spread abroad as the prospective cost of veterans' compensation. It turned out finally that it would be approximately $1,087,000,000 a year instead of $3,000,000,000 a year. I want to protest against any such misleading figures being given out to the public to the detriment of ex-service men and their benefits.

Recently the Veterans' Administration has given to Members of Congress and to American Legion officials an estimate of the prospective cost of the four-point program of the American Legion. They estimate the cost to be $113,200,000 a year, but they are not satisfied in giving that as the estimate. They go ahead and sum it up for a period of 5 years and say that the cost for 5 years will be $603,000,000. You might as well say that the Budget of the President is $50,000,000,000 as to say that such amount would be the Budget addition that will be called for by the veterans' program.

In itemizing these estimates the Veterans' Administration says that the cost, if you added all the service-connected cases back on the records as they were, would be approximately $70,000,000 a year.

By simple subtraction you can tell exactly what it is for those who were on last March. For the fiscal year 1933 the compensation to service-connected cases under the World War Veterans' Act was $184,000,000 and for this fiscal year it will be $118,000,000, and by simple subtraction you arrive at the sum of $66,000,000. It was $187,000,000 for 1932, showing that the curve had already started down.

However, the thing I want to protest against more than this $4,000,000 of overstatement is the fact that the Legion program says that the Government can have the right on these presumptive cases to show that the veteran's disability was not from service, and if that does not eliminate anybody, then the Economy Act is condemned on its face, because it took away from 23,000 men what they were entitled to from the standpoint of service connection.

There is another item here which says that the expense for dependents, widows, and orphans of World War men under the Legion program would be $27,000,000 a year.

I challenge this figure, because it was accepted here by the Veterans' Administration and by all the statisticians that under the proposed Rankin bill that was passed in the House at one time the cost would be around $28,000,000 per year over a 5-year period, and that provided $20 a month for the widow and $6 for each child. The bill which the Legion proposes carries only $15 for the widow and, I believe, $5 for the first child and $3 for each additional child.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. BROWNING. Five dollars for the first child and all the rest of them $3 apiece, which would give approximately 25 percent less than the Rankin bill. If that were $28,000,000 a year, then 25 percent would leave $20,000,000, approximately.

The item that they give of $16,000,000 a year hospital cost I challenge, because all of these institutions are running today, and their heat and other ordinary overhead charges are going on, and about all of the expense that would be added for these men who need hospitalization—and they would have to show that under this program and would also have to show that they are not able to pay their hospital fees—would be practically confined to the food they eat. This is about all the additional expense that would be incurred.

I have a high regard for General Hines, but I think he is getting careless about his figures. I want to protest against giving the country the figure of $603,000,000 as the proposed addition to the Budget which the Legion program will make when, as a matter of fact, under their own estimate, it is only $113,000,000, and I think it is nearer $80,000,000, according to what the Legion has given as the probable cost of these additions.

I am not wedded to this program, but I do say that this kind of careless handling of figures is in keeping with what we had when what I consider to be a vicious bill, from the standpoint of the veterans, the economy bill, was passed. It was influenced largely by propaganda based on figures that were wholly unreliable, and this campaign seems to have been started again.

I think the House owes it to itself to acquaint itself with these figures and the facts about them before a campaign starts to show that the crippled soldiers of the country are trying to bankrupt the Government. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am appearing at this time for the purpose of presenting to the House a question that will be up for consideration involving the veterans within the next 10 minutes.

In the reading of this bill when we reach line 20, on page 27, I propose to offer an amendment raising the appropriation made under this legislation for Veterans' Administration exactly $100,000,000.

My reason for proposing this amendment at this time is to correct some of the injustices of the Economy Act.

By reference to the appropriation bills for Veterans' Administration for the last 2 years it will be found that the appropriation for the last fiscal year of the Seventy-second Congress was nine hundred and twenty-seven million and some thousand dollars, and for last year it was five hundred and eighty-one million, which was a reduction of three hundred and forty-six million for the veterans alone. This year's appropriation in the bill we have under consideration is for $525,000,000, which means an additional reduction of $56,000,000, or a total of $402,000,000; and when you measure the $402,000,000 in terms of the former allowance of $927,000,000, it means, not a reduction of 25 percent, as demanded in the Democratic national platform of 1932, but a reduction of between 40 and 50 percent; and the Veterans' Bureau is now administering the Economy Act so as to take from veterans this vast sum of $402,000,000 without regard to the merit or demerit of the claims.

When I offer my amendment raising these figures, I shall do so upon the theory that the bill will go over to the Senate with the amendment, if it is passed, where no point of order will be made against it, and where they are not precluded by a rule from getting a legislative rider attached to the bill that will make it possible for this $100,000,000 to be apportioned to the veterans who have been wronged by the administration through the legislation we have enacted. When we reach that point I propose to offer this amendment, and I shall expect the men in this House who want to see the injustices righted to vote for my amendment and put on a legislative rider and let it go to the Senate, where they can debate it and so amend the basic law as to allow this additional fund to be allocated to the just claims of deserving veterans of the Spanish-American and World Wars.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Of course, the gentleman knows it would be a perfectly futile thing to add money to the bill as long as the basic law remains as it is. The gentleman understands that.

Mr. MAY. I understand that, but my idea is that the appropriate legislative committee of this House during the session can amend the basic law to take care of the money and then it is already appropriated and we do not have to come back here to make the appropriation. And if they do not get it, it will be in the Treasury. Otherwise it would have to come in a deficiency bill if it ever succeeded in getting through your hard-boiled committee, and then it might meet its Waterloo at the White House, or if not there, it would go through the fiery furnace before it gets by Gen. Frank T. Hines and Edward W. Morgan. We hear all kinds of pretensions of sympathy for veterans here on the floor of this House and from the outside we hear the voice of the Economy League crying out against Governmnt control by groups. I am wondering if gentlemen of the Economy League and the United States Chamber of Commerce have ever asked themselves what "little group of Americans" it was that stood beneath the flag at the second battle of the Marne in France in 1917 when the cry of General Joffre, the great French general, was, "They shall not pass!" and saved the day? I wonder if they know what "little group of Americans" it was that marched through the withering fire at Chateau-Thierry and the Argonne Forest and finally stayed the mad rush of the hordes of Germany from triumph? I wonder if they know what "little group of Americans" it was that made the imperial power of the German war machine hoist a flag of truce and on November 11, 1918, sent ringing around the world the glad news that no tribute would be levied upon American property, not even against the Economy Leaguers? I am still wondering if they know what "little group of Americans" it is that lie beneath the small white crosses in Flanders fields? May I ask, Mr. Chairman, if they know what "little group of Americans" it was that volunteered in 1898 to avenge the sinking of the battleship Maine in Habana Harbor and slept upon the ground in the disease-infested swamps of Cuba and ate spoiled beef to fill the coffers of the rich packers and died by the thousands while other thousands became diseased for life and are now suffering the wounds of the economy axe?

I wonder what "little group of Americans" it was that followed Gen. Joe Wheeler of Confederate fame and the unconquerable Col. Theodore Roosevelt up San Juan Hill and drove Spanish tyranny from the Western Hemisphere forever? I wonder if they know about that "little group of Americans" that is not really a "little group of Americans" but thousands of diseased veterans that need hospitalization and are languishing with every form or disease from the white plague to dysentery, while their wives and children are in bread lines, and while thousands of beds in our great hospitals are made empty by the Economy Act for which this House voted?

The Clerk read as follows:

Pensions: For the payment of pensions, gratuities, and allowances, now authorized under any act of Congress, or regulation of the President based thereon, or which may hereafter be authorized, including emergency officers' retirement pay and annuities, the administration of which is now or may hereafter be placed in the Veterans' Administration, $284,789,984, to be immediately available: Provided, That Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund, so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 20, strike out the figures "$284,789,984" and insert "$326,289,984."

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, my amendment increases the amount $41,500,000, and it will restore to all those veterans with war service-connected disabilities the same amount of money they were receiving prior to the Economy Act and prior to the Executive orders. It restores every penny to the disabled war veteran, and it does not include the non-service cases or free hospitalization for non-service-connected disability cases nor compensation for widows and orphans of non-service veterans.

I stated this morning, in discussing this matter, that no member of the Economy League had ever suggested that a penny be taken from those without arms or legs or with any sort of a war-connected disability.

Some representative of the National Economy League who heard my remarks on the floor a few hours ago, sent my statement to the director of the Economy League without my knowledge, I assume by telephone or telegraph, and received the following reply, which he has since placed in my hands, which reads as follows:

THE NATIONAL ECONOMY LEAGUE,
January 12, 1934.

Henry H. Curran, director of the National Economy League, when his attention was called to the statement of Representative HAMILTON FISH, Jr., of New York, that no member of the league had ever asked for a reduction in pensions paid to veterans disabled in war service, made this statement:

"Mr. FISH is quite right in saying that the National Economy League never suggested any reduction in pensions for the truly war disabled.

"We have always favored most generous treatment for the war-disabled veterans that may be possible in the judgment of the President and the Congress.

"We favor that now.

"With equal strength we insist, on the other hand, that not a single dollar be spent by the Government for any veteran who was not truly disabled by his war service.

"This is the principle laid down by the President and this is the principle which should control."

You will remember that some 10 months ago, when many of us voted for the economy bill, believing in the good faith of the President, believing it was necessary to make some concessions, and many of us on this side of the aisle supported the Economy Act, but not one of us thought a penny would be taken away from the war service connected disability cases. And yet between 30 and 70 percent was originally taken by Executive order from the armless and legless veterans and those shot full of holes. The Congress then rebelled, and by another Executive order this was reduced to about 25 percent.

My amendment proposes to restore the basic pay cut from 90 percent to 100 percent and restore all the rating schedules prior to the Economy Act for veterans with war-service disabilities. I believe this principle will have the support of most Americans who appreciate the lasting obligation the Nation owes to those who are today handicapped as a result of the part they had in winning the war, particularly in view of the recent Budget proposed by President Roosevelt, unbalancing the Budget by seven billion, that has bewildered and amazed the American people. The merciless misrepresentation of the administration and the resulting chiseling of the real disabled veterans whom fate has already chiseled is one of the tragedies of the new deal. The disabled war veteran, to whom we promised everything, has become the forgotten man.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph at the close of 5 minutes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph be closed in 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, the motion to close debate on this amendment is not prompted by any purpose to prevent the membership of the House having any discussion or consideration of any part of this bill where intelligent or constructive or even effective action might be taken. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] realizes, as well as all of us, as has been pointed out time and again during this debate, that it is a perfectly idle and futile gesture to load up this bill with funds that the Veterans' Administration could not use a penny of, to pay any veteran, until the basic law governing veteran payments has been changed.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Just a moment. It is no legitimate or logical argument to say that we will now put money into a bill upon the theory that perhaps there will be some changes made in it, and I reiterate now what I said earlier in the day, that I will join with the Membership of this House in trying to have some changes made in the regulations regarding veterans that ought to be made, but I want it done in an orderly and legislative and a proper way. There is no earthly need in undertaking to make an idle gesture to the veterans. They cannot be fooled by that, and the veterans know that their friends in this House who have spoken heretofore during the consideration of this bill and who have announced their intention of having hearings and having real inquiry into the merits of this matter are going to carry that out.

Mr. BROWNING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. BROWNING. Will there not be other appropriation bills that will carry other provisions that may be made by legislation or through Executive order regarding these allowances?

Mr. WOODRUM. Undoubtedly. There will be a first and second deficiency bill that can carry that.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. MAY. If this total appropriation for veterans was increased substantially, would it not be within the power of the Senate, if they wanted to attach a rider to an appropriation bill under their rules, to so amend the basic law so that it could be done?

Mr. WOODRUM. I do not think it would be within the power of the Senate to change the basic law when the power has been granted to the President to do it. It has to be done by the concurrent action of the Congress. Further, I do not believe the Members of this House are in sympathy with the statement of the gentleman from New York that he has reached a point where he believes that the President has not dealt fairly with the veterans.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. Yes.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I would like to know whether the gentleman wishes 9,657 Spanish-American War veterans who have been removed from the pension rolls, unless they are 100-percent disabled, to wait here and starve while he is doing that.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman does not want anybody to wait and starve. The gentleman has expressed himself on that. The gentleman believes it is right to proceed in an orderly manner in respect to these payments, and not go off on a wild gesture.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Does not the gentleman know that the rule which the House has brought in will be kicked out of the window by the other body and that they will legislate as they should to represent their own views?

Mr. WOODRUM. Parliamentary usage prevents my saying what I think the other body might do, but I am going to assume that the other body will do what I think this body will do, and that is proceed to a change in the regulations in a sensible and orderly way, in the way it ought to be done, and that is by a legislative committee of the House giving careful study to it and bringing in constructive suggestions about it.

Mr. McGUGIN. And what could be a shorter or simpler way than for the Congress to make an appropriation and then leave it to the President?

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman from Kansas would be the very first man in the 435 Members to be on his feet if this Appropriations Committee sought to come in here and appropriate funds upon the theory that Congress at some future time would authorize them to be expended.

Mr. McGUGIN. Not the Congress, but the President.

Mr. WOODRUM. The gentleman would be on his feet the very first to object to that.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute by Mr. MAY for the amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 27, line 20, after the word "administration", strike out "$284,789,984" and insert in lieu thereof "$384,798,984."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 47, noes 107.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGUGIN. Does the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia a moment ago closing debate preclude offering any amendment after the Fish amendment is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. It does not. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 59, noes 154.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McGUGIN. I offer an amendment pertaining to Spanish-American War veterans.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McGUGIN: Page 27, line 20, strike out "$284,789,984" and insert in lieu thereof "$330,789,984."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McGUGIN) there were—ayes 72 and noes 151.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For military and naval insurance accruing during the fiscal year 1935 or in prior fiscal years, $112,300,000.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call your attention to an unjust decision of the Veterans' Administration which I received this morning. In the Economy Act we penalized the widows of Spanish-American War veterans, and now the Veterans' Administration is taking from them their insignificant pension of $15 per month if they have any insurance benefits which give them $1,000 a year income.

I am speaking along humane lines, and if you gentlemen on my side of the House will be a little more humane in your action here, there will be more of you return to this Congress. I hope you will all come back. [Applause.]

The Economy Act took away from 9,657 Spanish War veterans their former pensions and left them penniless, and now comes the decision to take similar pensions from widows of Spanish War veterans, because they and their husbands saved, sacrificed, and suffered to pay insurance premiums.

It is abominable. Any man who will countenance that is not my type of American citizen or Congressman. [Applause.]

I spoke a moment ago with reference to the Spanish-American War veterans under 55 years of age who were removed from the pension rolls—9,657 of them—and this Committee refuses to give consideration to those men. We are wasting $1,000,000 in this bill for continued revaluation of railroads, but we decline to give just pensions to our disabled veterans. The men received heretofore $50 a month. They obligated themselves in the purchase of homes, and now they have been removed entirely from the pension list. As a consequence they are losing their homes and everything they have. My friends, the problem is yours. You are going home to meet the people in November. You will hear from them. They will let you know how they feel about it, and they will know how you reacted here when the friends of the veterans spoke in behalf of the veterans.

You heard a moment ago the honorable Member from Chicago [Mr. BRITTEN] speak in reference to national defense. What are we doing? We are destroying patriotism in America. Young boys are writing to me and saying, "If the American Government treats its veterans that way, we will never serve." It is not surprising that the colleges of America are adverse to national defense. This, perhaps, accounts for the large number of peace faddists among persons of intelligence. We are destroying patriotism in America through our treatment of the veteran. Our own President, when he made that statement in Chicago which inferred that unless a veteran was able to prove service connection he should get in the common bread line, made a statement which, in my opinion, is destructive of patriotism. I hope you will vote to give the veterans a square deal. That is all. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. In expending appropriations or portions of appropriations contained in this act, for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade in any bureau, office, or other appropriation unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act, as amended: Provided further, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation was fixed, as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act, (3) to require the reduction in salary of any person who is transferred from one position to another position in the same or different grade, in the same or different bureau, office, or other appropriation unit, (4) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and is specifically authorized by other law, or (5) to reduce the compensation of any person in a grade in which only one position is allocated.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. TABER: On page 30, after line 5, add the following paragraph:

"(6) No part of the appropriations contained in this act shall be available or used for, or diverted to, any private agency or corporation, executive establishment, or any bureau or branch thereof, nor shall there be any diversion of funds appropriated herein from the specific purposes for which they are appropriated."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state the point of order.

Mr. WOODRUM. As I caught the reading of the amendment, I think it conflicts with some portions of title II.

Mr. TABER. No; it is purely a restrictive limitation on the items in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BULWINKLE). The Chair is ready to rule. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is strictly a limitation. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to this bill, and I hope it will be carried in all of the bills to come, in order to prevent transfers. We have reduced the operating expenses of the Government to a point where we know about what the minimum is going to be to carry the Government along. The only way to keep down expenses at the present time is to prevent the transfer of appropriations. This is the first step, and this is the most important step for economy that will be made all the way through. If we are going to keep our expenses down in this Government, we have got to stop transfers. Now that things are settled, and we have heard from the gentleman from Virginia on practically every appropriation that he did not believe that any deficiency would be necessary.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman's amendment not prevent the transfer of the 12 percent that has heretofore been authorized as to appropriations within departments?

Mr. TABER. It was, but I do not believe it is necessary any more because I think we have gotten down to the point where we can get along without that transfer.

Mr. WOODRUM. Then, I may say to the gentleman from New York, it is in conflict with title II of the bill.

Mr. GOSS. The chairman has already ruled on the question.

Mr. WOODRUM. The Chair has ruled on it, but he ruled under a misapprehension.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I am in sympathy with the proposition that there should be no substitution, transfer, or diversion of funds after Congress has passed upon an appropriation; but in the last Congress after very careful thought and deliberation Congress authorized the transfer of not to exceed 12 percent within departments where it was necessary to live within an appropriation. That is, where a department had a fund appropriated for a specific purpose, within the activity of that particular department it had the right to transfer or divert from one activity to another not exceeding 12 percent of that fund. In my judgment this is desirable permission.

I do not approve of giving departments the right to divert funds, after Congress has appropriated them for one specific purpose, to something entirely different; but there is nothing in this bill, and there are no departments in this bill, that have been guilty of such practice. I would be in favor of some limitation on the rights of the Public Works Administration when they come to get their fund. I do not approve of the Public Works Administration giving money to governmental departments to be used in many instances on projects for which, after deliberate judgment, Congress has refused to appropriate. This is not involved in this amendment, however, so I hope the committee will feel justified in following the action of the subcommittee and reject the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of title II be dispensed with. You cannot change the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i." The reading of this title will only take up the time of the House. However, I couple with my request a direction that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The portion of the bill referred to is as follows:

TITLE II—ECONOMY PROVISIONS

SEC. 21. (a) Title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2 is amended by inserting after "1934" the following: "and the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935"; and

(2) Section 3 (b) is amended by inserting before the period at the end thereof the following: "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and shall not exceed 10 percent during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935."

(b) Section 105 (relating to the salaries of the Vice President, Speaker of the House, Senators, Representatives, Delegates, Resident Commissioners, and persons on the rolls of the Senate or House of Representatives) of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (except subsections (d) and (e) thereof), as continued and amended by section 4 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, is hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such section, in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures "1933" shall be read as "1935"; except that in the application of such section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935 (but not with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934), subsection (a) is amended by striking out "15 percent" wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "10 percent", and at the end of such subsection, before the period, by inserting the following: "Provided, That during such portion of the fiscal year 1935 as the percentage of reduction applicable to officers and employees of the Government generally is lower than 10, such lower percentage shall be applicable in lieu of the percentage specifically named herein."

(c) Section 107 (except paragraph (5) of subsection (a) thereof and subsection (b) thereof) of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933 (relating to certain special salary reductions); section 12 (relating to compensation reductions of officers and employees of insular possessions), section 13 (relating to the retired pay of certain judges), section 14 (relating to reduction in compensation benefits to certain civilian employees), and section 15 (relating to reductions in certain private pensions) of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934; and section 18 (relating to pensions for military service prior to the Spanish-American War) of title I of such act of March 20, 1933, are hereby continued in full force and effect for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for the purpose of continuing such sections with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, the figures "1933" (except in such sections 13, 14, and 15) shall be read as "1935" and the figures "1934" shall be read as "1935"; except that in the application of such sections 12, 13, and 18 with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935 (but not with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934), the percentage of reduction shall be the percentage applicable to officers and employees of the Federal Government generally.

(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of the antideficiency acts, deficiencies in their respective appropriations made during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress and available for obligation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, may be incurred during such fiscal year by any executive department or independent establishment and the municipal government of the District of Columbia, upon written order of the President specifying the amount of the deficiency which may be incurred, and by the legislative branch of the Government and the agencies customarily considered a part of such branch; but such deficiencies may be incurred only to the extent necessary to enable the payment to officers and employees of such activities of sums for which the available appropriation is inadequate by reason of a diminution in the percentage of reduction of compensation in pursuance of action of the President under the provisions of section 3 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, as continued for the fiscal year 1935.

SEC. 22. Title II of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 10. (a) The following sections, as amended, of part II of the Legislative Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1933, are hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935: Sections 201 (suspending automatic increases in compensation), 203 (prohibiting filling of vacancies), 206 (except subsection (a) thereof) (reducing travel allowances), 214 (authorizing temporary assignments in the Postal Service), 315 (restricting transfer of noncivilian personnel), 317 (authorizing transfers of appropriations), and 323 (reducing jurors' and witnesses' fees).

"(b) The following sections of the Treasury-Post Office Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1934, are hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935: Sections 7 (prohibiting administrative promotions) and 18 (suspending reenlistment allowances).

"(c) Section 9 (a) of the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934 (relating to rotative furlough), is hereby continued in full force and effect during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935.

"(d) For the purpose of continuing the sections enumerated in subsections (a), (b), and (c) of this section, in the application of such sections with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935: The figures '1933' shall be read as '1935'; the figures '1934' as '1935' (except in the case of the second proviso of such section 317); in the case of the first proviso of such section 317, the figures '1935' shall be read as '1937', the figures '1934' shall be read as '1936', and the figures '1933' shall be read as '1935'; and in the case of section 203, the figures '1932' shall be read as '1934.'

"(e) In the application of the sections enumerated in subsections (a), (b), and (c) of this section with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935 (but not with respect to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934), the following amendment shall apply:

"(1) Section 201 (suspending automatic increases in compensation) of part II of the legislative appropriation act, fiscal year 1933, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following: 'During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, in the case of the commissioned and warrant personnel of the services mentioned in the Pay Adjustment Act of 1922, the compensation to which the reduction of compensation under section 2 of title II of the act of March 20, 1933, as continued for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, shall be applied shall include pay and allowances which would have accrued by reason of promotion in rank but for the suspension of automatic increases in compensation by reason of promotion under this section, if such promotion occurred after June 30, 1932, but before July 1, 1935, but in calculating pay and allowances of the rank to which promoted service after June 30, 1932, and before July 1, 1935, shall not be included. This amendatory provision shall not authorize the payment of back compensation.'

"(f) No part of the appropriations made during the second session of the Seventy-third Congress shall be used to pay any increase in the salary of any officer or employee of the United States Government or the municipal government of the District of Columbia by reason of the reallocation of the position of such officer or employee to a higher grade after June 30, 1932, by the Personnel Classification Board or the Civil Service Commission, and salaries paid accordingly shall be payment in full.

"(g) Each permanent specific annual appropriation available during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, is hereby reduced for that fiscal year by such estimated amount as the Director of the Bureau of the Budget may determine will be equivalent to the savings that will be effected in such appropriation by reason of the application of this title."

SEC. 23. Section 8 of title II of such act of March 20, 1933, is hereby amended by inserting after the word "act" the following: "during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934."

SEC. 24. This act may be cited as the "Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1935."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BULWINKLE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 6663) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1935, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. In its present form I am.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH moves that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with an amendment as follows: "Strike out all of paragraph (d) on pages 32 and 33."

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion is in violation of the rule adopted by the House prohibiting amendments to title II of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard on the point of order? If not, the Chair is ready to rule.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH] offers a motion to recommit with instructions to strike out a portion of title II of the pending bill. The gentleman from Virginia makes the point of order that the motion to recommit with instructions violates the provisions of the special rule (H.Res. 217) under which the House is considering this appropriation bill.

The contention of the gentleman from Virginia is that since, under the special rule it is not in order to offer an amendment by a motion to strike out any part of title II it, therefore, is not in order in a motion to recommit with instructions to effectuate what may not be done directly in the House, to wit, move to strike out any part of title II.

It has been held on a number of occasions that it is not in order to do indirectly by a motion to recommit with instructions that which may not be done directly by way of amendment.

Mr. Speaker Cannon, on March 24, 1910 (Cannon's Precedents, sec. 9597), in deciding a question involving the right to recommit with instructions to incorporate in a general appropriation bill an amendment proposing legislation said:

This is a motion to recommit with instructions. If the motion had been made in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union as an amendment, or if it had been a provision in the original bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations, it would have been out of order under the rule which has just been read, and which has been a rule of the House for almost 50 years, if not more than 50 years; and under the rules that cannot be done indirectly, by a motion to recommit, which cannot be done directly.

The Chair is not alone in this construction of the rule. There is a uniform line of decisions by every Speaker since the Chair has been a Member of this House, almost 40 years, beginning with Mr. Speaker Blaine, followed by Mr. Speaker Kerr, Mr. Speaker Randall, Mr. Speaker Keifer, Mr. Speaker Carlisle, Mr. Speaker Reed, Mr. Speaker Crisp, Mr. Speaker Reed again, Mr. Speaker Henderson, and the present Speaker. All, without exception, have made the same ruling; so that the Chair not only has the letter of the rule but an unbroken line of decisions; and these precedents, as well as the letter of the rule, compel the Chair to sustain the point of order. The point of order is sustained. The motion is not in order.

On May 11, 1911, during the consideration of a tariff bill, Mr. James R. Mann, of Illinois, moved to recommit the bill with instructions to insert as a new section certain provisions. Mr. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, made the point of order that the amendment incorporated in the motion to recommit was not germane and therefore not in order. Mr. Speaker Clark, in ruling on the point of order, said:

It is not necessary for the Chair to pass any opinion on the wisdom of this new rule; it is his duty to decide according to the rules. It is clear that the amendment offered by way of matter contained in the motion to recommit under this rule would not have been in order if offered as an amendment; and on the high authority of Mr. Speaker Reed and Mr. Speaker Cannon, I sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Chair could quote many other decisions similar to these he has just read—made by Speakers Clark, Gillett, Longworth, and Garner.

The Chair believes that, inasmuch as the special rule, House Resolution 217, did not permit amendments or motions to strike out any part of title II of the bill either in the Committee of the Whole or in the House during the consideration of this bill, that it would not be in order to do indirectly by way of a motion to recommit that which could not have been done directly in the House.

The Chair on yesterday, in his decision on the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], intimated to the House the construction which he placed on the special rule, insofar as the motion to recommit with instructions is concerned. The Chair on that occasion said:

A question may present itself later when a motion to recommit with instructions is made on the bill H.R. 6663, that the special rule which is now before the House may prevent a motion to recommit with instructions, which would be in conflict with the provisions of the special rule. It has been held on numerous occasions that a motion to recommit with instructions may not propose as instructions anything that might not be proposed directly as an amendment. Of course, inasmuch as the special rule prohibits amendments to title II of the bill H.R. 6663, it would not be in order, after the adoption of the special rule, to move to recommit the bill with instructions to incorporate an amendment in title II of the bill.

The Chair is particularly anxious to refer to the language used by him yesterday, because the opinion expressed there was given before the House took action upon the special rule. All Members were, therefore, advised as to the construction that the Chair would place upon any motion to recommit with instructions which would be in conflict with title II of the pending bill. Inasmuch as the House sustained the interpretation of the rule as expressed by the Chair on yesterday by a vote on the appeal taken by the gentleman from New York, the Chair is constrained to sustain the point of order made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GOSS and Mr. SWICK rose.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Goss moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, I insist on recognition as senior member of the committee.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, I am a member of the subcommittee. I understood I was recognized. There is only one motion to recommit allowed under the rules.

Mr. SWICK. Mr. Speaker, I am senior to the gentleman from Connecticut on the committee. Am I not entitled to precedence in being recognized to offer a motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from Connecticut to make the motion to recommit.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania was on the floor demanding recognition. Does he not have priority over the gentleman from Connecticut to offer a motion to recommit when he outranks the gentleman on the committee?

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen are minority members of the Committee on Appropriations. The Chair had recognized one member of the minority on that committee who is qualified to offer the motion.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOILEAU. Does not a motion to recommit with instructions have priority over a straight motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The rules make no distinction between the motions, so far as priority is concerned.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 141, nays 240, answered "present" 2, not voting 47, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the Act of March 3, 1915, which established the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, I submit herewith the nineteenth annual report of that Committee for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1933.

The attention of the Congress is invited to the opening pages of the Committee's report giving the major reasons for the recent improvements in the speed and efficiency of airplanes for military and civil uses. The principal underlying cause of this remarkable progress has been the efficient functioning of the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics in coordinating and planning for the research needs of aviation, civil and military, and in conducting the necessary fundamental scientific researches to serve the needs of all agencies.

I concur in the Committee's opinion that the continuous prosecution of fundamental research in aeronautics is essential to the national defense and to the future of air transportation upon a sound economic basis.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1934.

THE ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a speech made by myself at Philadelphia, Pa., on the St. Lawrence waterway.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks made at a conference of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, held at the Bellevue Stratford Hotel, Philadelphia, Pa., December 18, 1933, in opposition to the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence Deep Waterway Treaty:

(Hon. J. Hampton Moore, mayor of Philadelphia and president of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association, presiding)

President MOORE. Ladies and gentleman, an outstanding fighter on many problems, but particularly with respect to the Canadian waterway, is with us. He has come from Washington for this particular purpose, and while we are approaching the lunch hour, at 1 o'clock, I propose to give to this speaker all the time between now and lunch time that he wants.

I know you will regret it when the Congressman concludes his remarks.

I have the pleasure in presenting to you the Honorable HAMILTON FISH, Jr., Member of Congress from the State of New York. [Applause.]

Congressman FISH. Your Honor, the mayor——

President MOORE. Congressman FISH.

Congressman FISH. And fellow delegates, I hold a very important telegram in my hand that has just been given to me, addressed to you, by the way, Mr. Mayor. It reads:

"Congressman SEGER out of town. Will not return in time for your meeting in Philadelphia Monday morning."

President MOORE (interposing). That was forwarded after he left. [Laughter.]

Congressman FISH. I want to tell you that he has been converted since that telegram was sent to you, and I want to assure you all that he believes in spending American dollars in the State of New Jersey and not in Canada.

I am delighted, Mr. Mayor, to come to this gathering, because you can really feel and see the spirit of the delegates. They have already made up their minds that they propose to go back home and defeat the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. [Applause.]

Some of us have been talking against the St. Lawrence-ocean ship canal and in favor of spending American dollars in America for 5 or 6 years—Mayor Moore, Congressman Ten Eyck, and Colonel Carrington, and Charlie Reed and others. But ours were voices crying in the wilderness.

I am convinced that the American people do not believe that the Government of the United States could seriously propose to spend hundreds of millions of dollars in Canada for the specific purpose of diverting trade away from the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and all the eastern seaports of the Nation. I am also convinced that the treaty will not be ratified if you are sincere in your protestations; if you will notify your own Senators that in this great emergency, with 10,000,000 unemployed, that you are opposed to spending any money in any foreign nation in the world, whether it be Canada, Germany, or Russia; but that it all be spent in America to relieve the distress that exists in our own country. [Applause.]

Now, I cannot use strong enough language to depict my own views on this St. Lawrence waterway project. I believe it to be an economic imbecility and a monstrosity and a fraud upon the American people and particularly upon those on the eastern coast with a population of 30,000,000. I say here in the presence of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, Mr. DICKINSON, a personal friend of mine, that I do not believe it will benefit one single American farmer by one cent to build the St. Lawrence-ocean ship canal.

It can be proved definitely, in spite of the fact that most of the propaganda comes from some ten or a dozen middle-western agricultural States who have been sold on the project and who have been deceived into believing that they will save 10 cents a bushel on their wheat for export from their States to Great Britain, that it is just a political myth. Congressman Ten Eyck very ably pointed out that the actual cost is 3½ cents and when it costs 3½ cents a bushel for freight charges, why it is a simple thing to arrive at the fact that the farmers won't save 10 cents. They won't save anything.

Furthermore, in view of the Ottawa Imperial Conference, where a preference was given to Canadian wheat by Great Britain, our farmers would not benefit if the canal were built.

We, in New York State, pay 30 percent of the taxes; although we may be opposed, we have not seriously opposed the farm-relief program, the destruction of the crops in the West and the plowing under of cotton in the South, or the birth control of pigs, and other farm experiments and similar measures put through Congress to increase the cost of foodstuffs in the Middle West. But we do seriously object to using American money to destroy the prosperity of eastern shippers and to divert trade built up through years of effort from our seaports to the St. Lawrence waterway.

I have been disgusted for years by the fact that New York business men, the chambers of commerce, the boards of trade, the Rotary Clubs, the Kiwanis Clubs, all have remained silent and almost permitted this treaty to be put through and almost permitted the business interests and the shipping interests of New York, Buffalo, Syracuse, Albany, and all down the river, to be raped without any objection at all by the very interests involved.

A few men have been carrying the burden whereas those whose best interests would have been ravished without objection on their part have permitted this treaty to get to where it is today, almost on the verge of passage. I am convinced now that due to this large conference that the push needed to prevent official action on the treaty has been set in motion.

I have attended many of your conferences. We have discussed so much that we were all bewildered and did not know what to do when we got home. I hope at this conference, at least, you will make up your minds that it is your own duty, representing the business elements and the consumers and 30,000,000 people in the East, that no matter what we contribute to agriculture in the West we do not propose to lend or give away one cent of money to build a canal in a foreign country to divert trade from our own seaports.

That is the issue before us.

You can take an hour on the proposition and you cannot get away from the issue of diverting trade from our seaports to a foreign country through a foreign-ship canal built by our own money. Think of it! New York pays 30 percent of the Federal taxes, and it is proposed to tax our people for the specific purpose of ruining our commerce and trade and handing it over to a foreign nation.

As one who lives at Murray Bay, on the St. Lawrence River, a portion of the year, and has certainly a friendly feeling for Canada, I am convinced that the reason the St. Lawrence River has not been used more extensively in the past was that it was not a logical place for the shipping interests to operate. Montreal is only 10 hours from New York by train, and if Montreal was the shortest and most practical route to Europe, the shipping interests would have gone up there regardless of everything else. The fact is that it is not. It is true that it is 300 miles shorter to Great Britain, but the St. Lawrence River is a thousand miles long and is fog-bound 2 days a week and, besides that, you run across the iceberg lane throughout the year, and the river is frozen over 5 months during the year. That is why the shipping interests have not moved to Montreal before this and it is why they remain in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and New York. The whole St. Lawrence project is predicated on propaganda eminating from two sources.

First, the western farmer. He will get no benefit whatever. Second, the water-power interests in my State and adjoining States. The western farmer and the eastern water-power magnates are aligned together against 30,000,000 consumers and wage earners in our eastern cities, and the shipping industry of our seaports.

Mr. Chairman, it does not do any good to come and talk here. We can assert our views, but most of us have not done much as far as making our views known back home. But out in the Northwest for 12 years the St. Lawrence ship canal has been made a political football. Every Congressman has gone before his people in Minnesota, Wisconsin, the Dakotas, Michigan, and other States and promised them that the St. Lawrence project will lower freight rates for the western farmers. Those Congressmen cannot turn against the proposition now. Those States have subsidized an active propaganda bureau in Washington, whereas the eastern States have not made their views known except through Mayor Moore and the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association.

I congratulate your organization on its effective leadership and predict success in your efforts to defeat the St. Lawrence Treaty. You have aroused the business interests in New York and eastern States at last and given really constructive leadership to the opponents of the proposed treaty.

Senator WAGNER, of New York, who has been on the fence, will soon hear from the New York Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, and Exchange Clubs and from the chamber of commerce and board of trade and individual importers and exporters and the shipping and allied interests, and I am confident that he will be 100 percent against the treaty when it comes up in the Senate.

Our people have been asleep for years. Now the issue is whether the treaty will be ratified next month or defeated.

It is dangerous for politicians to venture anything, but I predict that the treaty will be defeated, because you people have finally been aroused and awakened to your own interests. You have let the West dominate the situation and a handful of small western agricultural States, who will derive no benefit, have been permitted to take hold of the project through propaganda in Washington and have prevailed upon the Democratic President and his predecessor, a Republican, to advocate spending hundreds of millions of American money on the St. Lawrence canal, and that shows what propaganda can do.

This propaganda has been going on for over 10 years, and it reaches into high political offices for political reasons. Most of the big men in the administration have been committed, but the merits of the proposition are on our side about 99 percent. The American people are beginning to take an interest, and we will show the western farmer that he will not derive any benefit whatever and that trade will be diverted from the eastern seaboard, and the only possibility will be the developing of water power and the furtherance of water-power interests, and they are not much more popular than international bankers are today.

President MOORE. May I interrupt to present Senator COPELAND, of New York, who has just come in? [Applause.]

Congressman FISH. I am glad Senator COPELAND has come in because he has been fighting against the St. Lawrence ship canal for the last 5 years. No matter what position anyone else took, Senator COPELAND has taken the right side from the beginning, and he will do more than anyone else in the Senate in leading the fight to defeat the ratification, and he deserves the wholehearted support from the representatives of the different cities and groups throughout the State of New York who are attending this conference. [Applause.]

I will conclude by telling a story, because I believe this whole situation is as well known to you as to any of the speakers. The facts are before you, but I want to drive home a certain duty that we have, and unless you do appreciate your duty, the treaty will be ratified.

This is a story which is a very old and bewhiskered story, and it concerns two friends who graduated from college. One became a minister and the other became a sailor, and the seafaring man in a voyage around the world bought his minister friend a parrot. When he got home he found that the minister also had a parrot. Well, they put the two of them in a cage together. The sailor's parrot naturally looked with suspicion on the minister's parrot and hopped around the cage a few times, and when he got back on his perch the minister's parrot opened up with the conversation by saying "How can we attain salvation?"

That so frightened the sailor's parrot that he flew around the cage five or six times, and finally when he got back on his perch he answered, "Pump like hell or we will all go down." [Laughter.]

So my message to you is go home and "Pump like hell or we'll all go down." Or, in other words, work hard to defeat the St. Lawrence Treaty or it will be ratified and our eastern seaports will go down.

What we need is a spirit of cooperation and of unity and of aggressiveness to protect our own interests to defeat the treaty in spite of western propaganda.

I remember in the old football days that the best defense was a good offense. We have been on the defensive for the last 10 years and the westerners have been on the offensive with no case at all. It is time for us in the East to change from the defensive to the offensive, but above all we need cooperation, unity, and teamwork. You cannot let Mayor Moore, Senator Copeland, and Peter Ten Eyck carry the entire burden. You have all got to get behind them, for that is the only way to win, and if you go back home and pump hard, then the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty will surely be defeated. [Applause.]

President MOORE. The chair will not repeat "them cruel words." [Laughter.] They were too well spoken by the gentleman, who is an artist in that line.

As an American football player, whose reputation in earlier days extended throughout the world, I suspect Mr. FISH is qualified to speak in forceful terms, especially as to the pumping business. As to the rest, I hope it will all sink in.

THANK GOD FOR ROOSEVELT—A SOUND MAN WITH A GOOD HEART

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to insert in connection therewith a very short editorial.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, the editorials that I am inserting herewith under leave to extend my remarks are so nearly representative of the views of the people of my State, as well as my own views, it appeared to me that they would be read with a great deal of interest by the Members of the House as well as by the general public.

For the past 12 years I have been laboring for the general interest of every class of people as well as for every type of legitimate business. However, I have specialized in agriculture, realizing that the great agricultural South, a part of which I have the honor to represent, has not received a square deal at the hands of our Government. My people have a just cause to rejoice and idolize our President. He is the first President that we have had to give his very life's blood in the interest of every class of citizen and every line of legitimate business, including the Southland, on an equal basis with other sections of the country.

The Agricultural Adjustment Act, introduced by me and passed during the last session of Congress, is an administration measure. This act was formulated out of the President's campaign pledges and the Democratic platform of 1932. For your information I will state that this measure is working 100 percent with that great staple crop, cotton. Millions of dollars in the way of real benefits to cotton farmers have gone into the South. With the hearty cooperation on the part of cotton farmers in putting over the 1934–35 program, which is assured because the farmers of the South have confidence in the President, additional millions of dollars, which have heretofore gone to speculators and middle men, will go to these cotton farmers. The 1933 program advanced the price of cotton from 5 and 6 cents to 10 and 12 cents per pound. Without this legislation and without the 1933 program, the splendid cotton crop, produced by the sweat and blood of that great class of citizens in the South, the best on earth, would have sold at a price of 4 to 5 cents.

Why are my people cooperating so patriotically with the Agricultural Department and the President? It is because they realize, as stated, that, for the first time in the history of our country, they have been placed in the picture along with other well-protected groups.

In other words, my people have been paying in the way of tariffs millions annually—in many instances unfair and unreasonable rates—to these protected groups. But the South has never received any of these benefits or subsidies. Cotton farmers in the past have been forced to sell their cotton on an open, unprotected market, at a price based on a world price, without any protection or advantage over foreign cotton prices. Today we have a processing tax on cotton, 4⅞ cents, that is being paid by the consumers of cotton goods all over the United States, the benefits therefrom being paid to cotton farmers. This is nothing more than an indirect tariff. The cotton mills of the South fought this legislation to the bitter end. However, they are today, and have been since the passage of this act, enjoying tariff protection against foreign competition. In the meantime this legislation has been a lifesaver to this industry as well as to thousands of mill employees. Not only farmers, but every line of business in the cotton South, because of what is being done for the South under this legislation, have every reason to say with the writer of this editorial, "Thank God for Roosevelt."

The following editorials were written by the editor of the State, Columbia, S.C.:

[From the State, Columbia, S.C.]

THANK GOD FOR ROOSEVELT

The people of the country are able to greet this New Year with something stronger than hope.

For today they have a tested leader in whom they have faith. We wonder if we of the South realize the full import of the feeling of the people of the country at large toward the President of the United States. That feeling is not expressed when one says the President is "popular" with all classes of different political creeds. The feeling is not mere popularity. It is stronger than that; more deep-rooted. It is faith. And this deep-rooted belief and trust in the purposes, unselfishness, patriotism, and humanity of Roosevelt has developed spontaneously. Mr. Roosevelt has gone his quiet, natural way.

He came as a providential leader. He had faith and courage, and the faith and confidence reposed in him by the masses throughout the country is strengthening his arms and will enable him to go forward unchecked. The knowledge that the country has faith in Roosevelt, trusts and believes in him, has already given pause to many a politician in and out of the Democratic Party.

The "will of the people", about which one hears so much, cannot be voiced directly by the masses. That will can be voiced and made potent only by giving such support to leaders who are unselfishly devoted to the public's cause that they can press forward with their programs and prevail against opposition.

Millions of people in this country have many times in recent months had occasion to thank God for Roosevelt. And this quiet, kindly leader is still thinking and working day and night for the benefit of the millions. He must make mistakes, but he will rectify them as soon as discovered. By giving him their support, by standing back of him, the multitudes are helping the country.

There is another way of adding strength to the President's efforts, and that is for every business man in the country to make definite effort to emulate the faith and courage of their country's President. Some of the squawkers of a hundred days ago are now cheering. But their squawking at that time hurt the cause and retarded progress.

The country starts the new year with a leader, a leader with practical purpose and high ideals. He is worthy of being followed, supported, cheered.

A SOUND MAN WITH A GREAT HEART

President Roosevelt's message to Congress leaves little or nothing for the analyst.

HUEY LONG and a few Republican critics have raised the objection that he does not say what he wishes Congress to do, that he has not revealed his plans, that he has generalized. But he has as concisely and clearly as language can depict them relaid the foundations of principles and policies; he has stated his objectives.

"Idealistic" they will be termed by those groups "having no truck" with ideals. Against the spirit of the Constitution under which we have operated for nearly a century and a half will be contended by opposing political partisans and by some Democrats who would rather the people starve under a strict interpretation of the Constitution than live under such elasticity as permits experiments in an effort to meet new conditions and to counteract those fatal social and economic evils which have been born and developed during the period when strict interpretation of the Constitution was generally accepted as the only proper course.

The bald fact is that since early in March the activities of the Government which have brought about the present measure of recovery have stretched the theretofore rigid Constitution. The special session of Congress consented to such elasticity without a quiver. It fell back upon the oldest and most powerful law of humanity, that of necessity. It was necessary, in order to be saved, to concede elasticity to the Constitution.

Senator NORRIS, the Republican liberal from Nebraska, declared President Roosevelt's statement to Congress to be the "best message I have ever heard." But Senator MCNARY, of Oregon, said of it: "It is the finest repeal of the Constitution I have ever heard." And yet in that message the President proposed no new policy, laid down no new principle. He merely proposes to go forward upon those plans and policies which Congress approved early last summer and which were used to meet and turn back the public enemy, depression.

"We have", says the President, "plowed the furrow and planted the seed; the hard beginning is over. If we would reap the full harvest, we must cultivate the soil where this good seed is sprouting and the plant is reaching up to mature growth."

The President makes clear his conviction that the emergency program must be extended until the readjustments are complete. The emergency program is very expensive, but its continuance until business is again firmly established is a measure of safety which cannot be discounted. It is safeguarding against a relapse which would cost much more.

There is in the White House a man of aristocratic family, of education, and of inherited fortune. He is not going to be unjust to those having honest wealth; and he is friendly and sympathetic to the efforts and ambitions of those engaged in honest business. But he is, above all, the friend of and sympathizer with those in greatest need of sincere and powerful friends. Not in our time has there appeared such an honest and potent friend of the "forgotten man." The poor love him and the honest rich may trust him. He is a sound man with a great heart.

FACTS TO CONFOUND PESSIMISTS

One evening last week I went with a friend to a gathering of business and professional men. On the way this friend, who is a professional man and also owner of real estate and collector of rents, asked, "What can you tell me about economic conditions hereabouts which might be cheering?" I replied that any number of cheering facts could be recited, but that the outstanding needs were faith and confidence.

My friend shook his head sadly and remarked, "I wish I had your optimism."

Later in the evening it was mentioned in a group of men that the supply of houses centrally located in Columbia was about exhausted. "Yes", observed my above-mentioned friend, "the demand is very active. Do you know that at this time last year half the apartments in our apartment house were vacant, and now they are all full and I am turning away applicants daily?"

"And yet, you tarnation old croaker", said I, "you were just now asking me for some cheering evidence of better conditions. You had the proof, the irrefutable proof."

The whole face of the economic landscape would be changed over night and become most pleasing could business men everywhere cease attempting to discount known betterments by wearing long faces and indulging in dolorous tones. To maintain that old attitude many of them are actually lying to themselves. It would seem that to establish an alibi for their failure to exhibit faith and spirit which should be theirs at all times and which are now justified by the facts, they would wet-blanket those facts.

Do Columbians and South Carolinians, business men and professional men, wish a reiteration of facts?

Well, here are some which should cause professional pessimists a pain in the head:

Last week Columbians oversubscribed the 1934 community-chest budget by $4,700!

In November 1933 the postal receipts in Columbia were $5,645 more than in November 1932!

In November 1933 the bank clearings in Columbia were more than double the clearings in November 1932—the figures being $6,461,633 for November this year against $3,091,370 for November last year.

The Pee Dee section got about six millions more for its tobacco and the State of South Carolina about fifteen millions more for its cotton this year than last year.

But more vital to Columbia is this fact, as was recorded in The State yesterday: The Federal farm units in Columbia are spending for salaries and expenses more than three and a quarter millions of dollars a year, and $140,000 per month of such expenditures sticks right here in Columbia. From that source alone about $1,700,000 of new, outside money comes in here and stays here. Did the building of the Murray Dam bring more direct economic benefit to this city?

The cotton mills of Columbia, which last year were just trying to keep open, are now paying out on their short weeks $36,000 a week. On their better weeks the pay rolls run to $39,000. It will be seen, therefore, that based on the smaller pay rolls these mills are distributing $1,572,000 a year in Columbia. And that is new money. Every dollar comes here, like those paid by the Government, from outside the State.

It was announced yesterday that one and a quarter million dollars is being spent weekly by the Federal Government in South Carolina for civil-works projects and direct relief. Tens of thousands of dollars of that money are paid out every week in the territory immediately around Columbia. It all comes in a new money and it is not melted, buried, or burned. It is spent, and it finds its way into trade channels. Twelve weeks of such expenditures for civil works would total $15,000,000. That amount would represent a fine profit to South Carolina farmers on a 750,000-bale cotton crop.

In addition, other millions are being pumped into this State to refinance mortgages on farms and homes.

It is up to Columbians and South Carolinians to do their part. It is not a big part. It is merely to recognize cheering facts and give evidence of courage and spirit.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

A concurrent resolution to memorialize the Congress in the interest of the passage of legislation to prevent insurance companies unlicensed to do business in any State to use the mails to transact its business in any such State in which it has no license

Whereas attention has been called to this body, through the annual 1933 report of Hon. Sam B. King, insurance commissioner of South Carolina, to the increased activities of unlicensed insurance companies in this State; and

Whereas, under the existing law, the insurance commissioner has no authority to curtail such companies; and

Whereas many citizens of the State have suffered loss by dealing with unlicensed insurance companies; and

Whereas it appears that no State law can be passed to adequately meet the situation; and

Whereas the State of South Carolina is being deprived of certain revenues by reason of unlawful operation of such companies: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, memorialized to enact such legislation as will prevent insurance companies unlicensed to do business in the various States from using the mail to transact their business in any such State in which they have no license in accordance with the law of that State; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the clerk of the house of representatives to the Clerk of the Congress of the United States and to each United States Senator and Congressman from South Carolina.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S.C., January 11, 1934.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the senate and concurred in by the house of representatives.

[SEAL] J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, memorializing Congress to enact legislation designed to secure fair prices for agricultural products for the producer, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

(See resolution printed in full when laid before the Senate by the Vice President on the 8th instant, pp. 171–172 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Mr. SHIPSTEAD also presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States to take such steps as are necessary to secure passage of the Shipstead-Hoidale fire sufferers' bill, the same being known as H.R. 4774 and S. 770, to the end that the Government of the United States may discharge its just and lawful obligations to the citizens of Minnesota

Whereas in the Seventy-first Congress of the United States H.R. 5660 was introduced in the House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States on December 2, 1929 (companion bill, S. 3329, being introduced in the Senate of the United States on January 6, 1930); and

Whereas said bill H.R. 5660, was referred to the Committee on Claims in the House of Representatives and hearings were duly had thereon before a subcommittee on March 26, 27, 28, and 29, 1930, and which subcommittee has made a report to the full Committee on Claims confirming and finding from the testimony the facts hereinafter set forth in this resolution, which committee made a report thereon recommending the said bill for passage; and

Whereas said bill was again introduced in the Seventy-second Congress as H.R. 491 and was again reported upon favorably and recommended for passage; and

Whereas said bill is now pending in the Seventy-third Congress, identified as H.R. 4774 in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate as S. 770; and

Whereas each Member of Congress from the State of Minnesota has endorsed and approved said legislation; and

Whereas on October 12, 1918, the railroads in the United States were being operated by the United States Government as a war-time measure, under laws which held the United States Railroad Administration responsible for negligent operation of said railroads; and

Whereas on October 12, 1918, a devastating fire burned over hundreds of miles of territory in northern Minnesota, burning cities, villages, and towns, taking human life, and doing damage and destruction to an immense amount of property; and

Whereas litigation ensued, in which the citizens of Minnesota, suffering damage as a result of said fire, brought action against the Director General of Railroads of the United States, claiming that the Director General of Railroads was responsible for the damage resulting from said fire; and

Whereas in various actions tried in the courts the Director General of Railroads was held responsible for said damage, which decisions were affirmed by the Supreme Court of the State of Minnesota; and

Whereas prior to said litigation the Director General of Railroads had denied all liability for said damage and had taken the position that the Government was either responsible for all of the damage or for none of it; and

Whereas, following the determinations of said lawsuits, the Director General of Railroads then proposed "compromises" and made offers of settlement to the citizens of Minnesota and advised them that they would have to settle within certain "settlement areas" for a percentage of the loss as the same should be fixed and determined by the United States Railroad Administration; and

Whereas various citizens of the State of Minnesota were compelled by their destitute circumstances to accept the offers of the Director General of Railroads and to execute releases and to satisfy judgments in their favor for partial amounts of their losses, being unable to litigate their claims on account of the great expense involved and on account of congestion in courts and on account of long delay and other reasons; and

Whereas said citizens of the State of Minnesota, under the terms of the above legislation, H.R. 4774 and S. 770, will be entitled to receive the balance of the loss admitted by the United States Railroad Administration and are justly and fairly entitled to said payment; and

Whereas there has been long and vexatious delay in connection with said pending legislation and the Director of the Budget has made no recommendations thereon, and the United States Railroad Administration in the past has seen fit to oppose the passage of said legislation; and

Whereas both agencies are directly responsive to the executive branch of the Government and their officials are appointed thereby; and

Whereas it is a well understood fact that national legislation is shaped and the policy of the party leaders in the House and Senate is determined by the executive branch of the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolve by the Senate of the State of Minnesota (the house concurring), That the State of Minnesota does endorse and urge the passage of the legislation above referred to, to the end that the Government of the United States may discharge its just and equitable obligations to the citizens of the State of Minnesota; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state of the State of Minnesota be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States; to each Member of the House of Representatives in Congress at Washington, D.C., from the State of Minnesota; and to each United States Senator from the State of Minnesota at Washington, D.C.

Mr. LOGAN presented the following concurrent resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Kentucky on January 8, 1934, which was ordered to lie on the table:

Resolution adopted by Kentucky General Assembly January 8, 1934

Whereas our national life has entered upon a period of marked and rapid economic and social changes; and

Whereas the stern realities of a major depression have forced a far-reaching adjustment in business and governmental practice; and

Whereas as of March 4, 1933, we were in a time of keen distress, wide-spread misgivings, and unrest; and

Whereas within the period of a few months a great national administration has with bold, original, and ingenious strokes laid aside the strife of parties, the antagonism of personalities, the bitterness of particular controversies and restored the confidence and hope of the people, fed the starving, given work to millions of unemployed, revived a chaotic banking and currency system, abolished the sweatshops, taken child life away from machines, saved the homes of the farmers and urban dwellers, and made a lasting contribution to the peace of the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the house of representatives (the senate concurring) commend, approve, and uphold the governmental policies of our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and pledge to him that Kentucky will do its full share in support of the national administration, its policies, and practices.

We further commend the course of the Members of the United States Senate from Kentucky and the Members of the House of Representatives in their support of the national administration and request them to continue to support the policies of the President; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution signed by the speaker of the house and president of the senate, attested by the clerk of each, be mailed to the President of the United States, the Members of the Senate from the Commonwealth of Kentucky and the Members of the House from the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

BYRON H. ROYSTER,
Chief Clerk, Senate.

PROPOSED WITHDRAWAL OF C.W.A. WORK IN KENTUCKY

As in legislative session,

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred a telegram from the mayor and other officials of Covington, Ky., relating to the withdrawal of C.W.A. work in that State on the 1st of February.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram]

COVINGTON, KY., January 13, 1934.

Hon. M. M. LOGAN,
United States Senator:

It has been brought to our attention that it is possible that C.W.A. project work will cease February 1. In Kenton County, Ky., 3,500 families are dependent on governmental relief in its various forms. This is exclusive of county, city, religious, and charitable agencies, who are sharing their burden. The city and county are financially unable to carry on further. It is important that Congress pass necessary appropriations to see that the C.W.A. continues. Twelve thousand people in this county face starvation if this is not done. Private industry unable to absorb workers. Serious social disturbances might result if C.W.A. not continued.

JOS. F. PEIPER, Mayor.
THEODORE KLUEMPER,
City Manager, City of Covington.
JOHN B. READ,
Judge, Kenton County Court, Covington, Ky.

COTTON CONTROL LEGISLATION

As in legislative session,

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, some days ago I introduced a bill which had for its main purpose the placing of the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis and the prevention of unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce. I have received a number of telegrams from Alabama on the subject, and ask unanimous consent to have them printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CULLMAN, ALA., January 15, 1934.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Senate Chamber:

Regard Senate bill 1974, this county farm bureau of more than 2,000 members solidly for bill. Have personally contacted over 4,000 farmers past month and 90 percent for it. Do all in your power to make this bill a law.

CULLMAN COUNTY FARM BUREAU,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

All members of the St. Clair County Farm Bureau unanimously endorse your gin-control bill no. 1974 and urge its immediate enactment. All farmers attending cotton acreage-reduction meetings have also heartily favored rigid gin control. Your bill has the support of merchants and bankers as well as farmers. Our voluntary reduction program will be seriously handicapped by those farmers ineligible to sign contracts unless present plan supplemented by gin control.

W. J. HODGES,
President St. Clair County Farm Bureau.

EVERGREEN, ALA., January 14, 1934.

Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

Meetings have been held in every community in Conecuh County regarding new cotton program. Your proposed bill (Senate bill 1974) was brought up by farmers at every meeting. In each case the entire audience approved your bill and pledged their support. Total attendance over 3,000, or more than 90 percent of total farmer population.

P. L. WRIGHT, Conecuh County Agent.

DOTHAN, ALA., January 14, 1934.

C.W.A. WORK IN VIGO COUNTY, IND.

As in legislative session,

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have just received the following telegram from Terre Haute, Ind., from the executive committee of the Ex-Service Men's Club of that district, signed by Commander H. V. Norris, Judge Advocate R. M. Grizzle, and Adjutant M. D. Abbott:

TERRE HAUTE, IND., January 13, 1934.

Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:

We, the executive committee of the Ex-Service Men's Club, this district, hereby demand all civil-works projects be immediately stopped today in Vigo County. Also demand that a Federal investigation be held at once on the local Civil Works Administration, due to the fact that we know and have proof that there are 55 Federal work numbers now in existence in Vigo County that local Civil Works Administrator will not issue requisition for so that 55 unemployed men can go to work; also demand the local Civil Works Administrator's office be removed from local political parties. We also wish to protest the appointment of Richard A. Werneke as national relief administrator for Indians. Kindly wire answer to above telegram; a copy of this telegram has been sent to President Roosevelt.

H. V. NORRIS, Commander,
R. M. GRIZZLE, Judge Advocate,
M. D. ABBOTT, Adjutant,
Executive Committee.

Also, another telegram reading as follows:

TERRE HAUTE, IND., January 13, 1934.

Senator ARTHUR R. ROBINSON:

We are told can't have Federal investigation C.W.A. here; local administration tied with national administration; investigate today; urgent.

H. V. NORRIS,
R. M. GRIZZLE,
M. D. ABBOTT,
Executive Committee,
Ex-Service Men's Club.

I may say that I communicated with the Department in charge in Washington, and was informed that it should be taken up with Mr. William H. Book, in Indianapolis, who is directing matters out there. I have done so, and have just received word from him that a thorough investigation will be made.

REMOVAL OF GRADE CROSSINGS

As in legislative session,

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, during the special session, while hearings were being conducted upon the creation of a railroad coordinator, the question of the removal of grade crossings was discussed rather extensively. The question was asked at the time whether it would not be a legitimate use of public funds in case there was a decision to proceed with that program.

I have a very informative letter in the form of a statement as to the value of inaugurating a program of grade-crossing removal by the Civil Works Agency. I have not read anything more informative than that letter, printed in the Columbus Evening Dispatch; also an editorial on the subject in the same paper. I ask unanimous consent to insert both of them in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Columbus Evening Dispatch of Dec. 30, 1933]

MAKE MOST OF RELIEF FUNDS

To the EDITOR OF THE DISPATCH.

SIR: May I call your attention to the fact that although our Government is spending hundreds of millions of dollars to immediately relieve distress, yet much of the work done is not of lasting benefit or permanent in nature. It seems to me that in the effort of governmental agencies to create employment and promote recovery through the large expenditure of Federal funds on public works a type of project most productive of the desired result and a permanent monument to the public safety—the separation of railroad grade crossings—has not been given its merited importance.

After months of ineffective effort to get public-works construction started and the realization that the construction of substantial public improvements on a vast scale is not compatible with quick action, the C.W.A. was organized to give immediate employment to many of the unemployed. The workers under C.W.A. are employed on useful betterments at fair wages for their labors, but this is only relief. This phase of the situation and the effect was well expressed recently in the Engineering News-Record, as follows:

"But what the C.W.A. is bringing about is only relief. It is not a step toward recovery. Civil works lulls to sleep the self-reliance and initiative of local communities and does little to restore life-giving flow in the channels of industry and business. Recovery cannot be attained in this way. As before, it must be sought by driving, intensive prosecution of public-works construction."

That railroad grade separation projects would benefit the country as a whole and provide excellent opportunities for employment is the view of Joseph B. Eastman, Federal coordinator of transportation, and supported by statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Following an analysis of the cost data in the files of the Interstate Commerce Commission's Bureau of Valuation for 36 railroad grade separation projects, selected as being typical, the coordinating engineers reported that in their best judgment the expenditure for direct labor on railroad grade separation projects was 35 percent of the total cost of constuction, in contrast to the expenditure of 14 percent for direct labor on highway construction, as developed by an analysis of highway-construction costs in 1929 by the United States Bureau of Public Roads. These percentages take into consideration only the labor directly employed on the job and are exclusive of the labor involved in the manufacture, production, and transportation of the materials used in construction. The multiplication of employment in other industries resulting from construction has been estimated by various authorities as three or four workers in productive industry and transportation to every worker employed directly on the job. This point is well emphasized by William Green, president American Federation of Labor, in an article appearing in the May 18, 1933, issue of the Engineering News-Record, as follows:

"Back of every worker on the spot of construction would be a line of workers getting out the materials and transporting them for use. Workers for these jobs would be pulled off the relief lists, and their wages would be spent largely for consumer goods."

It has been reliably determined that in final analysis 85 percent of the expenditures for railroad grade crossing construction projects ultimately reaches the pay envelope of the worker.

It is evident that the administration and those responsible for the National Recovery Act recognized the possibilities for business revival and the large reservoir for employment that would be provided by railroad grade-separation projects in drafting that act. In the National Industrial Recovery Act as passed by Congress provision is made under title II, section 204, for $400,000,000 to be apportioned among the highway departments of the several States and specifically includes railroad grade separations as a desirable type of construction within the scope of this section in paragraph 1, as follows:

"* * * The amount apportioned to any State under this paragraph may be used to pay all or any part of the cost of surveys, plans, and of highway and bridge construction, including the elimination of hazards to highway traffic such as the separation of grades at crossing, the reconstruction of existing railroad grade-crossing structures, * * *."

The highway departments of the several States, with the exception of Illinois and Virginia, have demonstrated a decided reluctance to apportion any substantial part of the funds allottted them under N.I.R.A. for any large-scale railroad grade separation program. This indisposition on the part of the States to provide any substantial program for projects of this type has been so pronounced as to provoke comment from Mr. Thomas H. MacDonald, Chief of the United States Bureau of Public Roads, in a letter to Mr. R. V. Fletcher, general counsel, Association of Railway Executives, in connection with the program submitted by Kentucky, as follows:

"The program submitted by the State does not provide very much in the way of grade crossing elimination projects. This original program will be reconsidered, however, and recalling our former conversation with Mr. Miller, I talked at some length with Mr. Johnson along the lines of a more generous treatment of the railroads at this time.

"* * * We are not approving finally any programs. We are passing the program tentatively in order to get work started on the projects included which are desirable. No final approval will be given to any program as a whole. We wish to keep the available funds liquid for use whenever desirable projects come up * * *."

However, in contrast to the other States, the Illinois highway department has provided a program of extensive railroad grade separation projects. Of the $17,570,770 allotted to Illinois under N.I.R.A., $5,060,500, or 29 percent of the total funds allotted that State, has been apportioned for expenditure on this type of construction. The Illinois program provides for 73 distinctly individual grade separation structures and this number represents 37 percent of the total for this type of projects as proposed by the programs of the 12 Central States. The adoption of such an extended program for this type of project by the State of Illinois emphasizes their recognition of the importance of this type of public improvement, not only as a most productive means for employment and recovery, but also as the only infallible instrument for removing a terrifying menace from the highways.

The magnitude of the hazard presented by the railroad grade crossing to the highway traveler is well expressed in a letter from Mr. Joseph B. Eastman, Federal coordinator of transportation, to the Hon. Harold L. Ickes, Public Works Administrator, urging the importance of railroad grade separations as being most beneficial public-works projects, from which the following is quoted:

"In 1931 train accidents killed 4,853 and injured 20,057 persons. Of these, 1,811 were killed and 4,657 were injured in accidents at highway grade crossings. In contrast, only 40 railroad passengers were killed and 2,102 injured, and some of these were involved in highway-crossing accidents. Such accidents have become by far the most prolific source of loss of life from the operation of the railroads, with the possible exception of the trespassers on railroad property who are killed.

"The casualties from such highway-crossing accidents mounted rapidly and steadily, until they reached a peak in 1929 with 2,485 killed and 6,804 injured. Since that time there has been some decrease, and I suppose that it has been due to better protection of the crossings as well as to decreased traffic.

"Money spent in elimination of the most dangerous grade crossings would, therefore, be money exceedingly well spent from the standpoint of public safety."

Here in Ohio we have been shocked by the horror of 3 grade crossing accidents resulting in 9 fatalities, in recent weeks. One of these, that annihilated an entire family of 3, occurred on our own doorstep. The other 2 occurred at the same crossing in as many weeks at Cardington. The recent catastrophe of the Florida school bus resulting in the death of 8 pupils and injury to 30 is only one example of the danger present wherever grade crossings exist. While sympathizing with the mourners of that terrible fate we cannot but realize that it could have been an Ohio school bus transporting Ohio children, perhaps our own. In the Florida case the cause was attributed to poor vision because of fog, but the occurrence of 2 other school bus mishaps within the succeeding 8 days, not at crossings, injects the human element phase into the picture. In Ohio, there are at present approximately 2,200 existing railroad grade crossings on the State highway system, said to be the largest number of existing grade crossings on the highway system of any State. Combining this number with those existing in municipalities, towns, and villages, and on county roads, the total would easily mount to well over 3,000. Each of these grade crossings presents a potential death trap as long as they are permitted to remain, and they should be eliminated.

That the railroads are not solely responsible for the existence of these hazards and justly should not be burdened with the cost of their elimination is well established in the letter from Mr. Joseph B. Eastman, Federal Coordinator of Transportation, to the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Public Works Administrator, from which the following is quoted:

"Grade-crossing elimination has been a most painful thorn in the flesh of the railroads. The conditions which impel such eliminations with continually increasing force have been created not by the railroads, but by their competitors, the motor vehicles. From a railroad standpoint, moreover, the heavy capital expenditures involved in such eliminations fall far short of paying their way. This led the commission to say the following in its report in the Fifteen Percent case, 1931:

"'The railroads, as cities expand and public highways multiply in number and use, have been and are being called upon to invest great amounts of capital in alterations of their properties which are often, from a strictly railroad point of view, very largely nonproductive.

"'The burden of these expenditures must be borne by the public in one way or another, but the question arises whether this burden is apportioned fairly. To the extent that it is caused by other than railroad needs and does not increase the traffic of the railroads or save them expense, it may be that this burden should justly be shifted from the shoulders of the railroad users.'"

The railroads have been hard hit by the 4 years of depression. Car loading and earnings have declined to an alarming degree, and, therefore, the railroads are in no financial condition for large capital expenditures. The net operating income of class 1 railroads for the first three quarters of 1933 was reported in the survey of current business of the United States Department of Commerce as equivalent to a return of only 1.78 percent on the property investment of the roads. Such a small return on the property investment, with operating and maintenance costs cut to the bone, does not justify any except necessary exependitures for the benefit of the railroad users. Because of loss in revenue the railroads have been forced to adopt drastic policies of retrenchment, and any expenditures permitted by future increased earnings must be for substantial improvements to strictly railroad properties.

Delayed railroad roadbed improvements and further improvements necessary to maintain railroads in proper competitive condition to highways is estimated at $1,500,000,000, which is increased by needs for development of terminal facilities to about $2,000,000,000, in estimates of deferred and needed construction recently completed by a governmental research group at Washington in connection with proposals for a large recovery program of construction, as reported in the Engineering News-Record, of December 14, 1933. Based on these estimates this program of transportation improvement construction for the next 2 years is suggested as economically warranted.

Therefore, any extensive program of grade-separation projects at this time must of necessity be financed 100 percent with public funds as was clearly intended under title II, section 204, of N.I.R.A. Aside from the increased public safety provided, a large-scale railroad grade separation program is desirable at this time as an employment and recovery stimulant. That such use of Public Works funds was both economically sound and justified was the opinion expressed by Mr. Joseph B. Eastman, Federal coordinator of transportation, in his letter on the subject addressed to the Honorable Harold L. Ickes, Public Works Administrator, from which the following is quoted herewith:

"Use of Public Works funds for the elimination of these crossings would, therefore, be a great boon to the railroads, so far as capital expenditures are concerned. At the same time it would have a very healthy effect, both for the railroads and for their employees, in increasing traffic and employment while the construction is going on.

"If I can be of any use to you in this matter, by personal interview or in any way of collecting information or in any other manner, please feel free to call upon me. My belief is strong that use of the Public Works fund in the elimination of railroad grade crossings would be most beneficial to the railroads and to the country as a whole, having in mind not only public safety, but railroad traffic and employment and other employment as well."

At the time the allocation of the funds to the States was announced, specifically provided in title II, section 204, of N.I.R.A., as applicable to grade separations, the special board for public works issued a set of rules and regulations to govern the emergency construction to be financed thereby, in which the priority of grade separations was placed last, or in other words, least favored. In contrast, Mr. Thomas H. MacDonald, Chief of the United States Bureau of Public Roads, prepared a corresponding list, rated railroad grade separation as second in importance. It is understood that because of the strong views of public officials like Mr. Eastman and Mr. MacDonald, and some prominent business interests whose views have been quoted in the press, that railroad grade separations as public-works improvements afforded an excellent means of attaining the goal intended by N.I.R.A., this type of project has risen in esteem with the Public Works Administration. However, in connection with applications for financing, provided for in section 203 of N.I.R.A., of programs involving not less than $10,000,000 of railroad grade separations, not a single grade crossing elimination has so far been approved.

Estimates of deferred and needed construction, previously mentioned as having been recently completed by a governmental research group at Washington in connection with proposals for a large recovery program of construction, fix the estimated value of economically justified grade-crossing and related improvements ready for early construction, and suggested as the warranted program for the next 2 years, at $2,400,000,000. Whether such a large appropriation of public funds for the purpose is feasible or possible I do not know. However, in contrast to the ineffectiveness of the present public-works program as a stimulating recovery medium because of delay due to red tape, legal, and other difficulties in getting actual construction started on a large scale, I am reliably informed by the chief engineers of several trunk-line railroads traversing Ohio that their engineering departments have completed studies of the more dangerous grade crossings to the extent that award of contracts and actual construction operations are immediately possible. They further advise me that these initial contracts could be rapidly augmented with additional contracts until, within 60 to 90 days, at least $5,000,000 in railroad grade separation projects could be under actual construction in Ohio alone. This vast-scale program of railroad grade separation projects in Ohio, which would provide at least 500,000 man-days' work directly on the construction, would be well distributed over the State and would result in a desirable large spread of employment. It is only through such a program of immediate public-works projects of this type that the stimulating results intended by N.I.R.A. are to be realized and the expressed intention of Secretary Ickes "that every dollar spent represent a dollar of value" is to be attained.

The point I have tried to make is that we can and should spend our money for permanent and lasting improvements which at the same time give immediate relief. May we have your cooperation and support in this effort for the public good?

THE FRITZ-RUMER-COOKE CO.
W. A. FRITZ, President.

DECEMBER 28, 1933.

[From the Columbus Evening Dispatch of Jan. 1, 1934]

A WISE RECOVERY SUGGESTION

The Dispatch was glad to have the opportunity to print in the "Mail Bag" last Saturday an extended plea for a larger consideration of railroad grade crossings as a place for the expenditure of funds which Congress and the President have made available for the relief of suffering, the providing of jobs for the unemployed, and the general promotion of economic recovery.

The value of this letter, or article, lies in its strong, logical, and comprehensive argument, which speaks for itself; but it gave us all the more pleasure to print it that it comes from the brain and pen of a Columbus man, the well-known engineer and builder, W. A. Fritz, president of the Fritz-Rumer-Cooke Co.

Mr. Fritz calls attention to the fact that many of the projects on which these hundreds of millions are being spent are not of such a nature as to promise permanent endurance and lasting benefit—a fact which no thinking and well-informed person can controvert. He pertinently quotes the Engineering News-Record as saying:

"But what the C.W.A. is bringing about is only relief. It is not a step toward recovery. Civil works lulls to sleep the self-reliance and initiative of local communities and does little to restore life-giving flow in the channels of industry and business. Recovery cannot be attained in this way. As before, it must be sought by driving, intensive prosecution of public-works construction."

Grade-crossing elimination, on the other hand, is lasting in itself, will endure in its beneficial results to the general public, promotes safety of life and property in a field in which destruction is now very large, and will also be of great service in aiding in the rehabilitation of the railroads—one of the most necessary requisites in economic recovery. On this phase of the situation Mr. Fritz quotes Joseph B. Eastman, Federal coordinator of transportation, as saying in a letter to Secretary Ickes:

"Use of Public Works funds for the elimination of these crossings would, therefore, be a great boon to the railroads, so far as capital expenditures are concerned. At the same time it would have a very healthy effect, both for the railroads and for their employees, in increasing traffic and employment while the construction is going on.

"If I can be of any use to you in this matter, by personal interview or in any way of collecting information or in any other manner, please feel free to call upon me. My belief is strong that use of the Public Works funds in the elimination of railroad grade crossings would be most beneficial to the railroads and to the country as a whole, having in mind not only public safety but railroad traffic and employment and other employment as well."

Use of the Federal funds for this purpose depends very largely on the attitude of the highway departments in the several States, and so far Illinois and Virginia have taken the lead in an enlightened acceptance of the opportunity now offered.

Ohio has been slow, we are sorry to say, and it has not been because the need for grade crossings does not exist in this State. On the contrary, as Mr. Fritz shows, there are at present about 2,200 grade crossings in our State-highway system, which is said to be the largest number in any one State. And Columbus does not need to be told that they are constant sources of peril to the lives of our citizens and citizens of other States passing through.

As to the possibility of getting quick action in Ohio, Mr. Fritz says:

"I am reliably informed by the chief engineers of several trunk-line railroads traversing Ohio, that their engineering departments have completed studies of the more dangerous grade crossings to the extent that award of contracts and actual construction operations are immediately possible. They further advise me that these initial contracts could be rapidly augmented with additional contracts, until, within 60 to 90 days, at least $5,000,000 in railroad grade separation projects could be under actual construction in Ohio alone. This vast scale program of railroad grade separation projects in Ohio, which would provide at least 500,000 man-days work directly on the construction, would be well distributed over the State and would result in a desirably large spread of employment."

Mr. Fritz has demonstrated the existence of a great opportunity for Ohio. May we not say that he has also demonstrated the existence of an urgent duty for the Ohio Department of Highways and others in responsible official position who have power and influence which may be used to get quick and ample action in this important matter?

ANDREW HAMILTON

As in legislative session,

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, on January 4, 1934, a tablet was erected to Andrew Hamilton, the great lawyer who defended John Peter Zenger for libel—an occasion which constitutes one of the landmarks in the fights for the freedom of the press. All lovers of liberty and all believers in a constitutional democracy must revere the name of Andrew Hamilton.

I ask that the inscription upon the tablet, together with the address of Harry Weinberger, chairman of tablet committee, on the occasion be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Inscription on tablet]

To commemorate the distinguished public service of Andrew Hamilton, Philadelphia lawyer, who, in the year 1735, at the age of 80 years, after two New York lawyers, James Alexander and William Smith, had been disbarred for challenging the jurisdiction of the court, voluntarily and without fee defended in the City of New York and secured the acquittal by a jury of John Peter Zenger, publisher of the New York Weekly Journal, upon an information charging him with criminally printing matter that was a "false, malicious, seditious, scandalous libel", and thus, early in the history of the Colony of New York, in connection with the events out of which the accusation arose, contributed to the foundation and the subsequent establishment, in the American Colonies and the United States of America, of the now-cherished principles of constitutional liberty: freedom of the press; independence of the judiciary; independence of the bar; freedom of elections; independence of the jury.

He was granted the freedom of the city by the Common Council of the City of New York.

He designed the Pennsylvania State House, in Philadelphia, including the Assembly Room, now known as Independence Hall, in which the Continental Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence.

That room furnished the inspiration for this assembly hall which in consequence has been named Andrew Hamilton Hall. This tablet presented by members of the New York County Lawyers' Association, A.D. 1934.

[From the New York Law Journal of Jan. 5, 1934]

UNVEILING OF TABLET TO ANDREW HAMILTON—CEREMONIES AT MEETING OF NEW YORK COUNTY LAWYERS' ASSOCIATION

At the stated meeting of the New York County Lawyers' Association held last night in the Law Building of the association a tablet was unveiled to commemorate the public service of Andrew Hamilton, the Philadelphia lawyer who, in the early part of the eighteenth century, came to New York and defended John Peter Zenger, publisher of the New York Weekly Journal, upon the trial of an information charging him with criminal libel. The tablet was unveiled in the Assembly Hall of the Association Building, after an address by Harry Weinberger, chairman of the tablet committee, who spoke as follows:

"We are assembled here to do honor to a great lawyer, Andrew Hamilton, of the Philadelphia bar, who came to New York City about 200 years ago, and helped establish a free press, an independent jury system, and an independent bar, in the early colonial days of our history, by the defense of John Peter Zenger, a printer, on a charge of criminal libel.

"Like threads of gold and silver running through the history of the human race are the stories of the struggles for liberty—liberty which has lifted the human race from its knees to its feet, from its feet to its wings, and made them at times as nature intended them to be—free men and free women.

"It is fitting and proper in these times of stress and storm, in a shattering world of economics, when fear walks the earth, for lawyers on an occasion like this while honoring a great fighter for liberty, to reexamine the guideposts of liberty and look at the old and appraise the new. With almost one half of the world under the domination of dictators, with contending forces to the 'left' and to the 'right' in these United States, we must again determine whether liberty and democracy are chains of weakness or foundations of strength, and worth the price of maintaining them.

"Some men, forgetful of their history, are suggesting that the press be licensed, not realizing that the power to license the press is also the power to gag and destroy the press.

"John Milton, in his pamphlet Areopagitica, in the year 1644, denounced the ordinance passed by the English Parliament restraining unlicensed printing, and he never submitted any of his writings to be licensed. Milton well said:

"'Give me liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberty.'

"Almost all the Colonies in the early days of our history required printing to be licensed.

"Our Constitution, however, is opposed to a licensed press, or bridles on the tongue, or permits for peaceable assembly, or any limitation on the right to petition the Government. Shall we as a people tremble at the spoken or written word even in a changing economic world?

"When great issues are to be decided opinions are always strongly held and vigorously advocated. Hostile theories correct each other, and error of opinion may be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it. Even hateful minorities may be freely granted uncurtailed freedom of utterance. The greatest right in the world is still the right to be wrong.

"The freedom of the press must not be hampered; freedom of speech must not be suppressed. Abuse of free speech and free press dies in a day, but its denial shackles the race. This has been said thousands of times in different ways, but always needs repeating and never more than now.

"Some men in a hurry to save the world before nightfall would dispense with all liberty.

"Voluntary cooperation is not despotism; compulsory cooperation carried too far may be the road to tyranny, and tyranny is tyranny. We do not fear economic change; we do fear monopoly and loss of liberty.

"It is so easy to sell one's heritage of freedom for a mess of pottage; the necessities, the exigencies seem so great, the sale seems so temporary—the struggle to hold it seems so hopeless, so useless.

"Not on bended knees shall we meet the problems of today, but on fighting feet. It is better to die on fighting feet than to live on your knees.

"Before I briefly tell the facts of the Zenger trial may I say that if you call the roll of the great men of America of the past, who have left their impress on our history, the American Bar need not feel ashamed. There step forward lawyers, peers of them all, to mention only a few of the past—James Otis protesting against the writs of assistance, Thomas Jefferson writing the Declaration of Independence, the eloquent Patrick Henry, the fearless Andrew Jackson, the ponderous Daniel Webster pleading for one nation; Wendell Phillips, king of all orators and king of all agitators; the immortal Abraham Lincoln, and John P. Altgeld, Eagle forgotten. All names to stir the blood and arouse the enthusiasm of men. But in the vanguard of them all, to my mind, marches Andrew Hamilton, glorious of figure, stalwart of mind, courageous of heart, who, at 80 years of age, when most men who survive that age usually seek the easy chair and the fireplace, came to New York City to defend John Peter Zenger, accused of criminal libel.

"No finer cause did any lawyer ever have than this Zenger trial, to free the mind and speech and pen of a growing nation, and to establish as a great legal precedent that truth is always a defense to the charge of criminal libel, whether that truth has been hurled at those holding great governmental office or dictators or those entrenched in power. Greater battles of armed men may have been fought on this continent in wars that changed the history of our people, but no greater battle in America for human freedom in its lasting effect has ever been fought on any field, in any forum, or on any rostrum.

"All the power of all the Colonial Government, including the two judges of the court, were arrayed against him—but there Andrew Hamilton stood, there he battled, there he was victorious.

"John Peter Zenger in New York City printed his first newspaper, the New York Weekly Journal, on November 5, 1733, as opposition to a newspaper supporting the colonial officials and the Government. After a few copies had been printed the chief justice charged the grand jury on the law of libel and called their attention to Zenger's newspaper as a great disturber of the peace, and that all order and government was being endeavored to be trampled on.

"The grand jury, however, refused to indict.

"The committee of council ordered some of Zenger's newspapers burned by the common hangman near the pillory in the city as tending to raise seditions and tumults and disturb the peace. That last phrase has the familiar ring of modern times. The sheriff supervised the burning.

"On the 17th of November 1734 Zenger was arrested on a warrant charging him with criminal libel, inflaming the people's minds, and greatly disturbing the peace. He was kept incommunicado for several days and then was brought into court on a habeas corpus and demand was made that bail be fixed in a reasonable amount, claiming that right under the Magna Carta and other laws passed after that, wherein it was declared excessive bail, being in reality a denial of bail, was a great grievance under the law. Zenger filed an affidavit that he was not worth £40 (the tools of his trade and wearing apparel excepted). Bail was fixed notwithstanding at £400, and Zenger, not being able to provide it, would not ask others to do so, and went back to jail, and remained in jail until January 28, 1735, when he expected his release, for a second grand jury also refused to indict. But the attorney general then charged him by information for printing and publishing false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious libel, to the great disturbance of the peace.

"James Alexander and William Smith, of the New York bar, represented Zenger. They challenged the jurisdiction of the court, and the court disbarred them for it.

"The court thereafter appointed John Chambers to represent Zenger, and Chambers fought for and obtained a true struck jury.

"Zenger's friends, with the aid of Alexander and Smith, in the meanwhile had asked the aid of Andrew Hamilton, of the Philadelphia bar, the leading advocate of America. Though 80 years of age, and ill, this Philadelphia lawyer undertook the defense, without fee. The trial was held August 4, 1735, in the Supreme Court of the Colony in the old city hall, at the corner of Nassau and Wall Streets. The court room was crowded to the utmost of its capacity.

"The struggle in that court room symbolized, knowingly or unknowingly, the final goal that the people of these Colonies were seeking when they left the older countries of Europe. On one side was the Governor of the Colony of New York and New Jersey and all the forces of government, and on Zenger's side was most of the people of the Colony. If Zenger could be convicted for criticism, if truth was not a defense, the people would be powerless to resist any hardship their Colonial Governor might see fit to impose.

"Hamilton admitted the printing of the newspapers, though Chambers desired to put the attorney general to his proof.

"Hamilton, in an eloquent, powerful, and learned speech, contended that the words had to be false, as well as scandalous and seditious or else defendant was not guilty of criminal libel.

"The chief justice ruled the cases had held that a defendant could not give the truth of a libel in evidence—that it is still a libel though it is true.

"Hamilton replied:

"'These are star chamber cases, and I was in hopes that practice had been dead with the court.'

"In another part of his speech he said:

"'It is true in times past it was a crime to speak truth, and in that terrible court of star chamber, may worthy and brave men suffered for so doing; * * *'

"And he denounced the practice of filing informations against individuals instead of indictments by grand juries.

"He pleaded with the jury that a freeman has the right 'to complain when they are hurt; they have a right publicly to remonstrate the abuses of power in the strongest terms, to put their neighbors upon their guard against the craft or open violence of men in authority, and to assert with courage the sense they have of the blessings of liberty, the value they put upon it, and their resolution at all hazards to preserve it * * *.'

"Hamilton also said:

"'It is agreed upon by all men this is a reign of liberty, and while men keep within the bounds of truth, I hope they may with safety both speak and write their sentiments of the conduct of men in power * * *. Were this to be denied, then the next step may make them slaves.'

"Hamilton spoke at length of the great trial of William Penn and Mead in England as a precedent. That being Quakers and having met in a peaceable manner after being shut out of their meeting house, preached in Grace Church Street and were arrested for disturbance of the peace. He described how the court ordered the jury to find them guilty and, as Hamilton quaintly stated:

"'But the jury did not think fit to take the court's word for it.'

"And they acquitted Penn and Mead, and the court was so offended that they fined the jury 40 marks apiece and ordered them committed until paid, but one juror, Mr. Bushel, refused to pay and brought habeas corpus to be relieved from his fine and imprisonment, and he was released, the court holding his imprisonment illegal.'

"Hamilton then pleaded to the jury:

"'Let us at least do our duty, and like wise men (who value freedom) use our utmost care to support liberty, the only bulwark against lawless power, which in all ages has sacrificed to its wild lust and boundless ambition the blood of the best men that ever lived.'

"In conclusion, Hamilton said:

"'The question before the court, and you gentlemen of the jury, is not of small or private concern, it is not the cause of a poor printer, nor of New York alone which you are now trying. No! It may in its consequence affect every freeman that lives under a British Government on the main of America. It is the best cause. It is the cause of liberty, * * * for securing to ourselves, our posterity, and our neighbors, that to which nature and the laws of our country have given us a right—the liberty—both of exposing and opposing arbitrary power (in these parts of the world, at least) by speaking and writing truth.'

"The court desired the jury to bring in a special verdict that Zenger printed and published, leaving to the court the matter of law as to whether it was libelous. Hamilton insisted the jury had the right and power to decide the law and the facts and the jury brought in a verdict within 10 minutes of 'not guilty.' The next morning Zenger's discharge was moved and granted, and he was released from jail.

"The common council, which included the aldermen and the mayor, presented Hamilton with the freedom of the city, and by voluntary contributions, raised sufficient money to present him with a gold box for inclosing the seal of said freedom.

"Hamilton's glory shall never die, as long as human hearts thrill to the stories of the great and the mighty—the human mind remembers the deeds of heroes and martyrs, and mankind enjoys the liberty so dearly achieved through the centuries.

"If Andrew Hamilton were living today, and if again liberty were being attacked, he would probably declare in the supposed words of John Adams:

"'Live or die, sink or swim, survive or perish, I give my heart and my hand to this cause.'

"The members of the New York County Lawyers Association here dedicate this tablet and present it to our association, and may we annually hereafter hold meetings in this room in memory of a great lawyer and in rededication to the ideal of freedom and a free people."

IMPROVEMENT OF MONETARY SYSTEM (S.DOC. NO. 114)

As in legislative session,

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

To the Congress:

In conformity with the progress we are making in restoring a fairer price level and with our purpose of arriving eventually at a less variable purchasing power for the dollar, I ask the Congress for certain additional legislation to improve our financial and monetary system. By making clear that we are establishing permanent metallic reserves in the possession and ownership of the Federal Government, we can organize a currency system which will be both sound and adequate.

The issuance and control of the medium of exchange which we call "money" is a high prerogative of government. It has been such for many centuries. Because they were scarce, because they could readily be subdivided and transported, gold and silver have been used either for money or as a basis for forms of money which in themselves had only nominal intrinsic value.

In pure theory, of course, a government could issue mere tokens to serve as money—tokens which would be accepted at their face value if it were certain that the amount of these tokens were permanently limited and confined to the total amount necessary for the daily cash needs of the community. Because this assurance could not always or sufficiently be given, governments have found that reserves or bases of gold and silver behind their paper or token currency added stability to their financial systems.

There is still much confusion of thought which prevents a world-wide agreement creating a uniform monetary policy. Many advocate gold as the sole basis of currency; others advocate silver; still others advocate both gold and silver whether as separate bases, or on a basis with a fixed ratio, or on a fused basis.

We hope that, despite present world confusion, events are leading to some future form of general agreement. The recent London agreement in regard to silver was a step, though only a step, in this direction.

At this time we can usefully take a further step, which we hope will contribute to an ultimate world-wide solution.

Certain lessons seem clear. For example, the free circulation of gold coins is unnecessary, leads to hoarding, and tends to a possible weakening of national financial structures in times of emergency. The practice of transferring gold from one individual to another or from the Government to an individual within a nation is not only unnecessary but is in every way undesirable. The transfer of gold in bulk is essential only for the payment of international trade balances.

Therefore it is a prudent step to vest in the government of a nation the title to and possession of all monetary gold within its boundaries and to keep that gold in the form of bullion rather than in coin.

Because the safe-keeping of this monetary basis rests with the Government, we have already called in the gold which was in the possession of private individuals or corporations. There remains, however, a very large weight in gold bullion and coins which is still in the possession or control of the Federal Reserve banks.

Although under existing law there is authority, by Executive act, to take title to the gold in the possession or control of the reserve banks, this is a step of such importance that I prefer to ask the Congress by specific enactment to vest in the United States Government title to all supplies of American-owned monetary gold, with provision for the payment therefor in gold certificates. These gold certificates will be, as now, secured at all times dollar for dollar by gold in the Treasury—gold for each dollar of such weight and fineness as may be established from time to time.

Such legislation places the right, title, and ownership to our gold reserves in the Government itself; it makes clear the Government's ownership of any added dollar value of the country's stock of gold which would result from any decrease of the gold content of the dollar which may be made in the public interest. It would also, of course, with equal justice, cast upon the Government the loss of such dollar value if the public interest in the future should require an increase in the amount of gold designated as a dollar.

The title to all gold being in the Government, the total stock will serve as a permanent and fixed metallic reserve, which will change in amount only so far as necessary for the settlement of international balances or as may be required by a future agreement among the nations of the world for a redistribution of the world stock of monetary gold.

With the establishment of this permanent policy, placing all monetary gold in the ownership of the Government as a bullion base for its currency, the time has come for a more certain determination of the gold value of the American dollar. Because of world uncertainties, I do not believe it desirable in the public interest that an exact value be now fixed. The President is authorized by present legislation to fix the lower limit of permissible revaluation at 50 percent. Careful study leads me to believe that any revaluation at more than 60 percent of the present statutory value would not be in the public interest. I, therefore, recommend to the Congress that it fix the upper limit of permissible revaluation at 60 percent.

That we may be further prepared to bring some greater degree of stability to foreign exchange rates in the interests of our people, there should be added to the present power of the Secretary of the Treasury to buy and sell gold at home and abroad, express power to deal in foreign exchange as such. As a part of this power, I suggest that, out of the profits of any devaluation, there should be set up a fund of $2,000,000,000 for such purchases and sales of gold, foreign exchange, and Government securities as the regulation of the currency, the maintenance of the credit of the Government, and the general welfare of the United States may require.

Certain amendments of existing legislation relating to the purchase and sale of gold and to other monetary matters would add to the convenience of handling current problems in this field. The Secretary of the Treasury is prepared to submit information concerning such changes to the appropriate committees of the Congress.

The foregoing recommendations relate chiefly to gold. The other principal precious metal—silver—has also been used from time immemorial as a metallic base for currencies as well as for actual currency itself. It is used as such by probably half the population of the world. It constitutes a very important part of our own monetary structure. It is such a crucial factor in much of the world's international trade that it cannot be neglected.

On December 21, 1933, I issued a proclamation providing for the coinage of our newly mined silver and for increasing our reserves of silver bullion, thereby putting us among the first nations to carry out the silver agreement entered into by 66 governments at the London Conference. This agreement is distinctly a step in the right direction and we are proceeding to perform our part of it.

All of the 66 nations agreed to refrain from melting or debasing their silver coins, to replace paper currency of small denominations with silver coins, and to refrain from legislation that would depreciate the value of silver in the world markets. Those nations producing large quantities of silver agreed to take specified amounts from their domestic production and those holding and using large quantities agreed to restrict the amount they would sell during the 4 years covered by the agreement.

If all these undertakings are carried out by the governments concerned, there will be a marked increase in the use and value of silver.

Governments can well, as they have in the past, employ silver as a basis for currency, and I look for a greatly increased use. I am, however, withholding any recommendation to the Congress looking to further extension of the monetary use of silver because I believe that we should gain more knowledge of the results of the London agreement and of other monetary measures.

Permit me once more to stress two principles. Our national currency must be maintained as a sound currency which, insofar as possible, will have a fairly constant standard of purchasing power and be adequate for the purposes of daily use and the establishment of credit.

The other principle is the inherent right of government to issue currency and to be the sole custodian and owner of the base or reserve of precious metals underlying that currency. With this goes the prerogative of government to determine from time to time the extent and nature of the metallic reserve. I am confident that the Nation will well realize the definite purpose of the Government to maintain the credit of that Government and, at the same time, to provide a sound medium of exchange which will serve the needs of our people.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE—SUMNER WELLES

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I inquire if the Senate is now in executive session?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is in executive session for the consideration of the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty.

Mr. BORAH. On last Friday consideration of the nomination of Mr. Sumner Welles as Assistant Secretary of State was postponed at my request. The suggestion upon my part was based upon the request of parties on the outside and not in the Senate. I have no desire longer to postpone the consideration of the nomination. I have no information of my own upon which to oppose it, and I do not desire to postpone it any longer.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the nomination of Mr. Sumner Welles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read the nomination.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Sumner Welles, of Maryland, to be Assistant Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is ready to address the Senate on the St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, but there is a legislative measure pending which the chairman of the Commitee on Banking and Currency [Mr. FLETCHER] desires to have considered. I shall move to proceed to the consideration of legislative business for the purpose of considering that bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill is in reference to extending the life of the R.F.C.?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is.

Mr. McNARY. Has it been reported and is it on the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has been reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill, which is Senate bill 2125, was reported on the calendar day of January 12.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The bill is now on the calendar.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, today, as the Senator knows and as the Senate also knows, is the fifth anniversary of the ratification by our Government of what is known as the "Kellogg-Briand Pact." A number of Senators desire to submit a few observations on that subject, and I ask the Senator from Arkansas when it would be in harmony with his program for them to have that opportunity?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Utah, I think opportunity may be afforded immediately following the consideration of the bill which will be under the management of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER].

Mr. KING. That will be agreeable.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

CONTINUATION OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2125, being Order of Business 212, to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until February 1, 1935, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform under existing law, and the liquidation and winding up of its affairs as provided for by section 13 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, are hereby postponed during the period that the functions of the Corporation are continued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. No funds shall be disbursed on any commitment or agreement to make a loan or advance hereafter made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation after the expiration of 1 year from the date of such commitment or agreement; but within the period of such 1-year limitation no provision of law terminating any of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be construed to prohibit disbursement of funds on prior commitments or agreements to make loans or advances.

SEC. 3. The amount of notes, debentures, and bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is hereby increased by $850,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may say very briefly that the first section of this bill provides that until February 1, 1935, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform under existing law. The section continues the life of the Corporation until February 1, 1935, for the purpose of making these loans.

Under section 2 it is provided that no funds shall be disbursed on any commitment or agreement to make a loan or advance hereafter made by the Corporation after the expiration of 1 year from the date of such commitment or agreement.

Section 3 adds to the amount of notes, debentures, and bonds, or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time the amount of $850,000,000.

Those are the features of the bill. I call attention to the fact that on the 21st of this month, under the present law, this Corporation expires as to its functions or powers of making loans or disbursements; so that it is important to pass the bill as quickly as we can if we are to keep alive the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

So far as I know, the general idea and purpose are to do that. This bill takes care of it. The bill extends the powers and functions of the Corporation until February 1, 1935, unless sooner terminated by proclamation of the President, and adds to the funds in the hands of the Corporation the amount of $850,000,000.

That is the whole object of the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I ask the total amount which, with the addition of the $850,000,000, may be borrowed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. FLETCHER. As I remember, the amount is now $2,900,000,000. Adding to that $850,000,000 would make the total $3,750,000,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. I should like to make a further inquiry. My understanding is that under the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation it cannot loan directly to industries. Does the Senator know whether that is correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct. They are accomplishing that result to some extent by making loans to mortgage companies. They are authorized to make loans to mortgage companies.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was about to make that inquiry—whether the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is doing indirectly what it cannot do directly.

Mr. FLETCHER. Perhaps to some extent that may be true. I should not like to say positively that they are doing indirectly what they cannot do directly. They are authorized by law to make loans to these mortgage companies.

Mr. HASTINGS. The criticism that has been brought to me has been that a great many industries think they ought to be included. It is my understanding that the Congress thinks they ought not to be. Then the information comes that some industries have been able to get around the law by themselves organizing some finance corporation or some mortgage company, at the suggestion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation directors, who then proceed to loan Government money indirectly to a concern to which they cannot loan directly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it has been stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that this is the fifth anniversary of the ratification by the Senate of the United States of the Paris Peace Pact. I should like to speak briefly upon that subject, if the Senator will yield to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF RATIFICATION OF PARIS PEACE PACT

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, 5 years ago today the Senate of the United States concluded the discussion of and approved what was known as the "Paris Peace Pact", and for fear that some of the Members of the Senate may have forgotten just what that peace pact contained, I want to read the two short articles contained therein.

ARTICLE 1

The high contracting parties solemnly declare in the names of their respective peoples that they condemn recourse to war for the solution of international controversies and renounce it as an instrument of national policy in their relations with one another.

ARTICLE 2

The high contracting parties agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts, of whatever nature or of whatever origin they may be, which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

Mr. President, those two short paragraphs are commonly known as the "Paris Peace Pact", or the "Kellogg-Briand Peace Pact." I desire to make just a brief statement regarding the history of this instrument.

I hold in my hand a little book published by Arthur Charles Watkins, who is the director of the National Students Forum, on the Paris Pact. He gives in the first chapter something of the history of the adoption of the treaty. He states that Mr. Briand, the Foreign Minister of France, on April 6, 1927, the tenth anniversary of the entrance of the United States into the World War, gave an interview to the Associated Press. I shall read just one paragraph of what Mr. Briand stated in that interview at that time. He said:

If there were need for those two great democracies—

Referring to France and the United States—to give high testimony of their desire for peace and to furnish to other peoples an example more solemn still, France would be willing to subscribe publicly with the United States to any mutual engagement tending to outlaw war.

A little later Hon. Frank B. Kellogg, who was then Secretary of State, took this matter up with Mr. Briand, and Mr. Kellogg stated in December 1927, in a note:

It has occurred to me that the two Governments, instead of contenting themselves with a bilateral declaration of the nature suggested by Mr. Briand, might make a more signal contribution to world peace by joining in an effort to obtain the adherence of all the principal powers of the world to a declaration renouncing war as an instrument of national policy.

After some further communications, there was a conference of 15 of the leading nations of the world, whose representatives met at Paris, and on August 27, 1928, at the foreign office in Paris an agreement was signed which culminated in the peace pact which I have just finished reading. It was signed at that time by the representatives of 15 governments, and was approved, according to their laws and constitutions, by the various governments themselves. Since that time 47 other nations have approved this treaty and became adherents to it, making a total of 62 nations of the world which have adopted this so-called "Paris Peace Pact."

Mr. President, this treaty outlaws war, and all these 62 nations have agreed to settle their disputes without war.

Treaties in this country are considered as a part of the supreme law of the land. Sometimes this peace treaty is referred to as a scrap of paper. Personally, I am very much opposed to any such statement in regard to any treaty adopted by the United States, or adopted by any other government, and especially a treaty of this kind, adopted by 62 of the great nations of the world.

I want to read a paragraph from the Constitution of the United States. Article VI, paragraph 2, reads:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Therefore, Mr. President, this treaty becomes part of the supreme law of the United States, and anyone who tries to set forth the opinion that it is only a scrap of paper, it seems to me, insults the United States Government, and especially the Senate of the United States, which approved this peace pact 5 years ago today. It is really a part of our law, and it seems to me it is up to the Government of the United States to live up to the provisions of this treaty, both in spirit and in action.

Some may ask what we have done during this 5-year period to promote this treaty, or to carry out its provisions. I am sorry to admit that mighty little has been done. We have not reduced our armament during that period. We have not reduced the size of our Army and Navy. We have not set an example for disarmament during that 5-year period.

During that time we have appropriated and spent approximately three and a half billion dollars for the upkeep of our war forces in the United States, probably at least three times the amount spent in the 5-year period prior to the World War. We have spent during this 5-year period a larger amount each year than any other nation on the face of the earth has ever spent in peace times for war purposes, and I must admit that that is not very good example to set for other countries which have signed this peace pact along with the United States.

The United States was one of the promoters of this peace treaty, and it seems to me it is up to us to do our part to carry it out honestly.

During the last few months some $238,000,000 have been set aside for new construction of the Navy, and I understand the work has actually been begun on new battleships and other vessels for the Navy. I want to ask, why this immense appropriation for the building of a larger Navy? It certainly is not in harmony with the Paris Pact. The only reason I can see for the enlargement of our Navy at the present time is a determination to make our Navy just a little larger than that of Great Britain.

I desire to ask those who are proponents of a larger Navy—and it seems to me the question naturally arises—Is our Navy for defense or for offense? I am sure that no one will admit that we intend to enter into any offensive warfare, and if the Navy is for defense, then it seems to me we indicate that we doubt the honesty and sincerity of the other 61 nations which adopted this so-called "Paris Peace Pact."

We are setting an example that naturally, it seems to me, would lead the people of other nations to think that we ourselves are not seriously bound by the Paris Pact that was adopted by the Senate 5 years ago.

Of course, if we want to invalidate this treaty, then let us continue to increase our armaments, to build more battleships, cruisers, and so forth, to enlarge our Army, to continue to spend more money for war purposes in peace times than any other Nation has ever spent in peace times. It is estimated that during the past several years we have spent at least one sixth of all the moneys spent by the great nations of the world for war purposes—and that in peace times; and that, too, in the face of the fact that the representatives of our country were the promoters of the Paris Peace Pact.

I think it will be conceded by almost everyone that a small or weak nation cannot insure its security by the building up of a navy or an army. It must also be conceded that no one great nation can secure adequate defense and security by building a navy or raising an army against the rest of the world. Therefore, what is the use of this theory of building a greater navy at the present time, just to have it a little larger than that of Great Britain?

I am very thankful, Mr. President, that there are a few honest-to-God organizations in this country of ours working for the prevention of war, for disarmament and world peace. These peace organizations are doing very good work. They are arousing public sentiment for world peace and disarmament, and for the outlawing of war; arousing public sentiment for honestly living up to the provisions of the Paris Peace Pact, and also arousing public sentiment against compulsory military training in our State universities and colleges. After all, Mr. President, public sentiment is what is going to enforce this peace treaty, if it is enforced and lived up to. Public sentiment, when aroused, can accomplish almost anything; and if these peace organizations that are so whole-heartedly working to bring about world peace and disarmament can succeed in arousing sufficient public sentiment, there is no doubt, Mr. President, about the representatives of the public who are at the head of the United States Government living up to the Paris Peace Pact.

If we honestly want peace, it seems to me we must prepare for peace and not for war. There is an antequated saying that "If you want peace, you must prepare for war." Past history has proven that theory to be all wrong. Invariably, preparations for war have resulted in war and not in peace. I believe that situation is truer today than it ever was in the past, and it was absolutely true in the past.

God grant that the time will soon come when the billions now being spent in preparation for war, and thus promoting fear and hatred, can be used for the general betterment of mankind and for the promotion of brotherly love.

God grant that the time will soon come when American boys can procure a practical college or university education in our State institutions without being compelled to take at least 2 years of compulsory military training.

Let the United States live up to her treaties, both in spirit and practice, and let us honestly strive for world peace and not for world war.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Miss Jeannette Rankin, a former Representative in Congress from Montana, on the subject of Outlawing of War, as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement by Miss Rankin is as follows:

UNTIL WAR IS OUTLAWED THERE IS NO HOPE OF NATIONAL OR INTERNATIONAL SANITY

To maintain the war atmosphere, peoples are taught to fear, hate, and envy one another. The establishment of understanding between peoples is deliberately prevented by campaigns of misrepresentation and mistrust.

UNTIL WAR IS OUTLAWED THERE IS NO HOPE OF NATIONAL OR INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC SOLVENCY

The most prosperous European nations are ruined by the destruction of property and productivity and by the creation of debts for destruction purposes in the World War. This ruin gradually destroyed the entire structure of international finance, until today each nation struggles desperately to prevent the collapse of its own economic system.

MEANWHILE THE COST OF ARMAMENTS STEADILY INCREASES

Hopelessly bankrupt nations still lavish millions upon expensive armament, serving no purpose except to nourish the swelling octopus of international insecurity.

UNTIL WAR IS OUTLAWED THERE IS NO HOPE OF RELIEF FROM TAXATION

More than three quarters of our national income goes to pay the costs of past wars and to maintain a military establishment which will generate wars for us in the future. Any economies that Congress can effect in the remaining one quarter can make no material difference in the total burden of national expenditures.

UNTIL WAR IS OUTLAWED THERE IS NO HOPE OF REAL PROGRESS IN SOCIAL BETTERMENT

Even in good times the amount left over after war and past-war appropriations have been made is inadequate to finance programs already formulated for the preservation or enrichment of our natural resources or for the spread of educational or other benefits among our people. State activities, too, are crippled by the drain on our national resources for purposes of war.

Until war is outlawed, all the best instincts of humanity all over the world, impulses toward cooperation and constructive effort, are repressed and held in leash, while all the worse instincts of humanity, destruction impulses culminating in hatred and in the murder of soul and body, are encouraged and given free rein. In their abandonment to the blood lust "civilized" nations have not hesitated to arm and train "backward races" for the destruction of their fellow Europeans. Should "civilization" continue to offer this example to the races now rapidly developing national aims and ambitions the harvest of our perverted ideal will be a bitter reaping.

The last war selected for elimination the healthiest and most intelligent male citizens. Of these millions were killed outright, millions more were sent "home" without eyes, without faces, without arms, without legs, suffering from chronic physical disease, a prey to incurable mental disease, changed from young men animated by hope to human fragments condemned to finish their life span as a burden to the community and to themselves.

Future wars, if they come, will destroy civilian populations with even greater efficiency than the last war attained in the destruction of armies. Stanley Baldwin says: "It is well for the man in the street to realize that no power on earth can protect him from being bombed."

Unless war is abolished there can be no such thing as security anywhere. Happy homes all over the world are built upon a foundation of quicksand which may at any time draw them down into the abyss.

Unless war is abolished the fruits of every man's labor may be withered at any moment and turned to dead ashes in his hands. Against this destruction, when it comes, each of us is without defense.

We know now that the aftermath of war is more war. The phrase "the war to end war" has become a painful joke.

We know now that the fruit of war is tyranny and not liberty. The evils precipitated by war have led to the creation of dictatorships in one country after another. The phrase "war for democracy" has become a painful joke.

We know now that treaties purporting to limit the use of certain weapons in war are meaningless, since desperate nations use all weapons available to them. If we rely on such agreements our misplaced confidence will some day bring upon us a lesson fatal in its finality. Even in prize fighting it is difficult to prevent hitting below the belt; and in war there is no umpire. Attempts to lull us into a delusive feeling of security by restrictive agreements are a painful joke.

We know now that in war there are no winners. Modern war is a suicide pact in which both sides are doomed to death. The idea of waging war as an aid to trade or prosperity is a painful joke.

Before government developed judicial and police powers disputes were perpetuated by the blood feud. The blood feud passed on by inheritance from generation to generation and came to an end only if both families concerned had been wiped out by the successful prosecution of a plan of mutual interassassination. A similar perpetuation of disputes and a similar ending may be expected from a continuance of the appeal to war for the decision of disagreement or the redress of grievances.

Only the substitution of law for war can secure the ends of justice in international relations and preserve the race from ultimate extinction.

JEANNETTE RANKIN.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has the floor. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, we have just listened to a timely and important address by the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. It is to be regretted that so few Senators were in the Chamber to listen to his stirring appeal for peace. If material things were under consideration and appeals were being made for huge appropriations from the Treasury for military purposes, doubtless many of the seats in the Chamber would have been occupied.

As indicated by the Senator, this is the fifth anniversary of the ratification of the multilateral treaty for the renunciation of war. This treaty was signed at Paris on the 27th day of August 1928, by the United States and 14 other powers. When the President of the United States—Calvin Coolidge—submitted it to the Senate for ratification, it had been approved by 59 of the 64 independent nations of the world. Since then, as I am advised, other nations have approved the treaty, so that practically all nations have joined in its covenants, solemnly condemning recourse to war for the solution of international controversies, and also solemnly renouncing war as an instrument of national policy in the relations with one another. This treaty also declares that the parties thereto agree that the settlement or solution of all disputes or conflicts of whatever nature or whatever origin they may be which may arise among them shall never be sought except by pacific means.

This important international instrument was received with manifestations of joy and satisfaction among the civilized peoples of the world. They sincerely believed that it was a most important step toward world peace, and therefore gave to it their enthusiastic support. It is true there were some cynics in this and in other lands who refused to regard it with favor, but on the contrary contended that neither it nor any other international compact or agreement could or would prevent international conflicts. They were committed to the view that war is a part of the law of life and that whether peoples and nations are stagnant or dynamic, communities and nations will be destroyed, governments overturned, and battlefields made red with the blood of human beings. They see no hope for world peace, no advancement by the application of the principles of justice and righteousness toward the goal which promises to the world the highest form of civilization.

Mr. President, I fear the American people have forgotten the significance of the Kellogg-Briand Pact and the obligations which it imposes upon our Nation as well as other nations. Permit me to refer briefly to this extraordinary document. It declares that the signatories to the same are "deeply sensible of their solemn duty to promote the welfare of mankind", and that they are—

> Persuaded that the time has come when a frank renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy should be made, to the end that the peaceful and friendly relations now existing between their peoples may be perpetuated.

They declare, among other things, that—

> Changes in their relations with one another should be sought only by pacific means and be the result of a peaceful and orderly process, and that any signatory power which shall hereafter seek to promote its national interests by resort to war should be denied the benefits furnished by this treaty.

They express the hope that all nations of the world will join in the humane endeavor for world peace, and so, by adhering to the treaty, bring their peoples within the scope of its beneficent provisions, so that the nations of the world might be united in a common renunciation of war as an instrument of national policy.

It seems obvious that if the terms of this important treaty were scrupulously and honorably observed, the world would be free from the desolating wars and horrible conflicts which have brought such woes and sorrows to humanity. It seems inconceivable, with the advance of civilization, with the spread of the spirit of Christianity, and with the acknowledged evils which result from fratricidal conflicts and desolating wars, that nations should devote so much of their revenues and energies to the building of engines of human destruction.

Nearly all nations of the world having pledged themselves to renounce war and to settle all disputes by pacific means, it is astounding that there should be so much talk of war and military preparations. Billions of dollars are annually wrung from the people in order to build military fortresses and forge weapons of destruction. Millions of the flower of the world are drawn from the paths of peace and trained and disciplined in methods for the destruction of human beings.

Some nations are organizing for war. Too few are organizing the world for peace. Is it not singular that the occidental nations, most of the people of which profess to be disciples of the Prince of Peace, have been the most aggressive exponents of war and are largely responsible for the development of the war psychology which has inoculated other nations? It must be confessed that there is much hypocrisy in these protestations for peace, when at the same time weapons are being forged for the destruction of life and plans formed to compass the defeat or overthrow of nations.

It is well, Mr. President, that we pause today in the deliberations of this body for the purpose of examining again the treaty which calls for the renunciation of war. It were well if we would devote our thoughts this day to the spirit behind the Kellogg-Briand Pact, to the objects which it sought to attain, and to the goal which could be attained, if the nations signatory to the pact should be guided by its spirit and by the solemn obligations which the signatories to the same have undertaken.

Great moral and spiritual leaders in various ages have sought the adoption of policies that would result in the settlement of all international controversies by pacific means. The League of Nations was inspired by a desire for world peace, and to accomplish that end it sought to provide the machinery by which conflicts among nations might be settled by judicial and arbitral tribunals, rather than by the sword upon bloody battlefields. The Kellogg-Briand Pact is a proper corollary to the obligations assumed in the league covenant. This pact does not interfere with the legitimate aspirations of any nation, and it seeks to introduce into international relations that benignant spirit of municipal law which provides for peace and order in the domestic concerns of nations. Why should not people be willing to renounce war as a national policy? Why should they not agree to settle disputes by peaceful means rather than by barbarous methods? Are societies and nations organized primarily for war? Should the prosecution of war be a national policy? We speak much of the inviolability of the person, of the sacredness of life; cruelty and inhuman treatment even to beasts are denounced; and yet civilized peoples sit down with complacency, too often thoughtlessly, to devise ways and means of preventing peace and of letting loose calamities in the shape of war, which undermines and destroys nations, depopulates cities, and fills the world with woe and sorrow.

Many historians in eloquent words show the folly of war and the evils resulting therefrom. They declare that the fierce spirit of nationalism which animates too many people is a manifestation of primitive passions—a deadly anachronism—and reveals the slow growth of those ethical concepts and moral precepts by which humanity should be guided. This is a day, unfortunately, of fierce and narrow nationalism; strident voices are heard here and elsewhere in behalf of war, and demands are made for billions of dollars to be expended in preparations for war. Many affect to believe that patriotism can only exist where there is a militant spirit and an entire disregard of the rights of other peoples and other nations. In many parts of the world there is a recrudescence of passions and atavistic propensities which belong to other ages and which should have been buried and forgotten. Efforts are made to fan the flames of racial hatreds and animosities toward peoples of other lands. I wonder if we forget that racial hatreds and deep-seated animosities have resulted in the most tragic consequences and destructive calamities that have visited the peoples of the world? Apostles of peace—not peace at any price but noble peace—are criticized and, indeed, denounced, and the militarists and those who in a vainglorious way demand stupendous sums for military preparations are acclaimed as the genuine patriots.

In all ages there have been prophets and apostles crying in the wilderness for humanities good, proclaiming the universality of law, the brotherhood of man, the fellowship of humanity.

Nineteen hundred years ago there came into the world One whose life has been an inspiration to millions and who laid the foundations of a faith which will ultimately conquer the world. He was born in an obscure place in Palestine and lived in obscurity until He attained the age of 30 years. His surroundings were humble and His associates were among the poor of the earth. He toiled with His hands in a carpenter shop. His friends were the humble people of Nazareth and His footsteps led him but a few short miles beyond the limits of that unimportant village. When 30 years of age He left His village, but did not go beyond the narrow limits of Palestine. He proclaimed the gospel of love, of peace, of salvation. He gave to life a new meaning, and lifted humanity to the throne of an eternal and everlasting Father. He had no property; He held no official position; He sought no worldly place; He lived in poverty and spent the 3 eventful years of His life in ministering to the poor, healing the sick, opening the eyes of the blind and teaching those truths and principles essential to the healing of nations and the happiness and peace of the world. He was at times deserted by His friends; betrayed by one of His disciples; and crucified upon a cross between two thieves. It has been stated by an eloquent divine that the only property He left was the garment for the possession of which the soldiers cast lots.

Military heroes have come and gone; nations have risen to eminence and wasted away; persons who held high station and were acclaimed in their lifetime are forgotten; but the humble Nazarene, the Great Prince of Peace, the Apostle of Love and Righteousness—He lives and the progress and advancement of humanity will be in proportion to the acceptance by the people of the sublime teachings of the Crucified Master.

Is it not time again and again to challenge the world to His example, to His teachings, to the principles which He announced, and to the importance of their acceptance and incorporation into our lives? And so today we should turn our thoughts toward those measures and policies, which, though imperfect, will lead our Nation and, indeed, the world, into the atmosphere of peace and fellowship and away from the hateful and belligerent spirit of war.

I take this occasion to pay tribute to an American statesman whose name will be forever identified with this treaty. Many of those in the Senate remember when Hon. Frank B. Kellogg was a Member of this body. He gave his support then to important international policies with a belief shared by many that they would contribute to world peace. As Secretary of State he joined with Briand in preparing what is known as the "Kellogg-Briand Pact", and the communications which passed between them, as well as representatives of other nations, relative to this treaty reveal the passionate desire which he had for world concord and his sincere belief that the instrument which he, with Briand, drafted would exercise a powerful influence in the promotion of harmonious relations among nations.

No reference to this important treaty would be complete without sincere tribute being paid to one of the greatest statesmen of Europe—Briand, who gave of himself unsparingly to promote peace in Europe and to establish peace in all the world. And we may not forget upon this occasion that great German statesman, Stresemann, whose untimely death was deplored in all lands. In my opinion, if he had lived a few years longer, Germany would not have pursued the path in which she now walks. He believed in democratic institutions and sought the rehabilitation of his country within the limits of harmonious relations, not only with France but with all other nations. He was leading Germany, and was being aided by Briand as well as others, out of the gloom which possessed the people, and he believed that in the not distant future Germany would occupy an exalted position among the nations of the earth.

Under Stresemann the passions of the war were subsiding, and the Allied Nations and their peoples were seeking Germany's rehabilitation. If he had lived, many believe Hitlerism would have been impossible, and the confusion now reigning in many parts of Europe would not have resulted. It is not too much to say that Hitlerism has brought serious disquietude to Europe, and has proved an obstacle to those peaceful evolutionary movements which would have eventuated in the not distant future in harmonious relations between Germany and the allied nations. Smaller nations contiguous to Germany, which were making industrial and economic progress and under which there was a high degree of liberty and development, are now filled with apprehension, and they feel constrained to adopt policies at variance with what their peaceful development envisioned, in order to meet apprehended dangers which the course of Hitler and his regime have aroused among them.

Senators will recall that Stresemann was the German Minister of Foreign Affairs when the Kellogg-Briand Pact was under consideration, and in behalf of the German Government signed the treaty. In his note to the American Ambassador prior to the signing of the pact, he stated that the "German Government is ready to conclude a pact in accordance with the proposal of the Government of the United States, and to this end to enter into the necessary negotiations with the Governments concerned." He further added that his Government expected that the treaty was of such importance that it would not fail to make its influence felt at once in connection with the shaping of international relations. He then added:

* * * this new guaranty for the maintenance of peace must give a real impulse to the efforts for the carrying out of general disarmament, and further still, the renunciation of war must as a necessary complement enlarge the possibilities of settling in a peaceful way the existing and potential conflicts of national interests.

It is unfortunate that the humane and statesmanlike views expressed by him do not guide the policies of the present German authority.

The Italian Minister of Foreign Affairs—Mussolini—in his letter to the Ambassador at Rome, declared that Italy—

* * * has welcomed, with lively sympathy this initiative and offers very willingly her cordial collaboration toward reaching an agreement.

If I were to turn from the perhaps irregular current of these remarks, I might say that Japan is pursuing a course which is occasioning serious concern, not only among the Asiatic people but among occidental nations. There are many who have been sincere friends of Japan, but who cannot countenance the course which she has pursued during the past 2 or 3 years, and who see in her domestic, as well as her foreign policies, the development of a militaristic, indeed imperialistic, spirit, prophetic of trouble, the circle of which will not be confined to the territorial area in which Japan is operating.

Expenditures being made by Japan are regarded by many as a challenge to other nations and as an avowal of the purpose of Japan to pursue an aggressive policy in her dealings with China and Russia. This is most unfortunate because Japan, for a number of years preceding and immediately following the World War, had grown in influence and had secured the esteem and the good will of substantially all nations. The American people sided with Japan in the mighty struggle between her and Russia a few years ago. Christian nations gave their sympathy to Japan when she was contending against the great Russian Christian nation. It would be most unfortunate if Japan should pursue a policy that would isolate her from the world and compel the thought that she intended to dominate Asia and attempt to dictate international policies throughout the world.

It is to be noted that Japan gave cordial support to the Kellogg-Briand Pact. Baron Tanaka, Japanese Minister for Foreign Affairs, in his letter to our representative shortly before the treaty was signed, stated:

* * * In reply I have the honor to inform you that the Japanese Government are happy to be able to give their full concurrence to the alterations now proposed, their understanding of the original draft submitted to them in April last being, as I intimated in my note to his Excellency Mr. MacVeagh, dated the 26th of May 1928 substantially the same as that entertained by the Government of the United States. They are therefore ready to give instructions for the signature, on that footing, of the treaty in the form in which it is now proposed. I cannot conclude without congratulating your Government most warmly upon the rapid and general acceptance which their proposals have met with. The Imperial Government are proud to be among the first to be associated with a movement so plainly in unison with the hopes everywhere entertained, and confidently concur in the high probability of the acceptance of this simple and magnanimous treaty by the whole civilized world.

The allied nations welcomed Japan as a fitting associate in a great enterprise. The United States has been a true and genuine friend to Japan. I believe it is the desire of the American people that that friendship shall be unbroken; but the cords of friendship between individuals and nations may be severed. Upon several occasions in the past I have defended Japan and have denied that she was imperialistic or that she sought to pursue dangerous military policies in Asia or elsewhere. I wonder whether recent events justified my position?

I sincerely hope that the friendship which I and others have entertained for Japan will not be shattered by unwise and dangerous enterprises upon the part of the Japanese Government.

Mr. President, I cannot believe that the signatories to the Kellogg-Briand Pact are oblivious to its obligations, or indifferent to the great benefits which the observance of its terms will bring to the people of the world. Unfortunately, now, as in other generations, the strident voices of those who disturb the peace, and who do not attribute to humanity those virtues inherent in all, are raised against the policies that make for peace and world solidarity.

Chauvinistic elements exert their influence, great or small, to develop an atmosphere of suspicion and unrest. Efforts are made to arouse an improper national pride and racial and other animosities, calculated to develop international controversies. If the peoples of this and other lands would give but a tithe of the energy employed by them to spread confusion and disrupt the ties of international good will and fellowship—to the promotion of amity and good will among nations, the day would not be so far distant when the prophecies of old would be realized, and peace would reign and men would learn the arts of war no more.

Mr. President, the challenge to the world today is the formulation of some plan by which nations may settle their disputes without resorting to the arbitrament of the sword. In my opinion if the purpose for which the League of Nations had been established had been observed, the confusion and animosities now existing would have been prevented. The Kellogg-Briand Pact was a logical supplement to the League. If its terms are adhered to and the instrumentalities provided by the League—including the World Court—for the settlement of international controversies, are invoked, then there can be no occasion for armed conflicts and the destructive and desolating wars which crimson the pages of history. President Coolidge, as well as the Secretary of State, declared that the ratification of the treaty would constitute a notable contribution to world peace; and that the spirit of this treaty should aid in the mobilization of the moral forces of the world. Of course if peoples run amuck, animated by malice, revenge, and fear, then the temples of civilization may be destroyed. War is oftentimes the product of fear, and the clamorous voices of the militarists have often inspired fear.

Hon. Arthur Henderson, who was president of the Geneva Disarmament Conference, declared that humanity has been caught in a vicious circle; that nations have sought security by armaments and then sought to justify their military preparations on the grounds of self-defense. He further declared that the world has been organized for generations past for war but that no effective organizations have existed for peace. He states a truism, that peace has been sought in a negative way, not in an affirmative way, and that where peace has come it has been regarded by many as a sort of cessation from strife and as an interlude in the oft-recurring conflict of peoples.

The evidence of the resurgence of primitive passions—though I believe they are becoming diluted—are apparent when efforts are made to arrest the movement for enormous military appropriations or to effect organizations for the promotion of world cooperation and peaceful associations. Those supporting such movements are often traduced and assailed by military organizations and patriotic citizens whose philosophy is that wars are inevitable and that peace and world unity are iridescent dreams.

The futility of war should be apparent to all. It is the height of folly, and indeed madness, for governments to follow the reckless and dangerous policies of militarists and those who teach that humanity may never escape the bloodshed and carnage with which war has deluged the earth. It is time to conduct a rational examination of the causes of war, because in so doing their futility would be demonstrated and a basis would be laid for the organization of the moral forces of the world, to the end that the evil and destructive influences that make for war might be eliminated and destroyed.

President Roosevelt, in his recent address before the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, stated that "the blame for the danger to world peace lies not in the world population, but in the political leaders of that population."

He further stated:

> The League has provided a common meeting place; it has provided machinery which serves for international discussion; and in very many practical instances it has helped labor and health and commerce and education, and, last but not least, the actual settlement of many disputes, great and small, among nations great and small.

The President declared that—

> The old policies, alliances, combinations, and balances of power have proved themselves inadequate for the preservation of world peace. The League of Nations, encouraging as it does the extension of nonaggression pacts, of reduction of armament agreements, is a prop in the world-peace structure.

He further added that—

> Through all the centuries and down to the world conflict of 1914 to 1918, wars were made by governments. Woodrow Wilson challenged that necessity. That challenge made the people who create and who change governments think. They wondered with Woodrow Wilson whether the people themselves could not some day prevent governments from making war.
> It is but an extension of the challenge of Woodrow Wilson for us to propose in this newer generation that from now on war by governments shall be changed to peace by peoples.

It is for the people in this and other lands to organize for peace, to challenge those in authority whose selfish or unjust policies provoke international controversies or tend to create fear and distrust among the people. It seems to me that the great forces of labor, the educational institutions, the religious organizations, and all the humane, cultural, and rational elements, agencies, and instrumentalities throughout the broad land should unite in one great movement for the purpose of outlawing war and converting the peoples of the world to a recognition that this is a moral universe in which law and order must prevail.

I have referred to the clamorous voices of the enemies of peace and those who follow the destructive, if not the degrading, philosophy of Nietzsche. This philosophy still has its devotees, and in our own country there are those who are endeavoring to impress upon the people that our country is menaced by other nations, and that only by the expenditure of enormous treasure in so-called "preparedness" may disaster be averted. These alarmists are believed by some, and their predictions incite fears and apprehensions in the minds of others.

Fourteen or fifteen years ago a high naval officer declared with the utmost seriousness that war with Japan was certain within a year, and that it was imperative that our Government carry forward the 1916 naval program, which called for the expenditure of approximately a billion and a half dollars. There was no justification for the statement made, but it aroused apprehensions, if not fears, and led to demands that our Government construct 16 powerful battleships and battle cruisers, to be followed by auxiliary craft, at a cost, as I have indicated, of nearly a billion and a half dollars.

This proposed naval building program upon the part of the United States aroused fears in other countries and led to the formulation of plans by them for greatly increased armaments. It was only a few years ago that our Army consisted of but 25,000 men, but our military expenditures today amount to approximately $800,000,000 annually. For the past 8 or 10 years our annual appropriations to meet the ordinary expenses of the Army and Navy have been between seven and eight hundred million dollars.

We are now proposing substantially this sum for the ordinary expenses for the next fiscal year, and in addition there have been allocated from the Public Works Administration fund approximately $300,000,000 for the construction of new naval vessels. But that is not all. Demands are made for the authorization of $450,000,000 for the construction of 101 additional war vessels. No nation on earth in peace time has made such huge appropriations for military purposes as has the United States during the past 10 years; and we are now met by demands for increased appropriations for the Navy, notwithstanding the enormous burdens of taxation and the colossal deficits which must be met by increased taxation or the credit of our country will be impaired. These enormous appropriations by this Republic have repercussions in other countries. Inquiries are being made as to the reason that the United States is devoting such enormous sums for military and naval purposes.

This is but natural. This Republic stands in no danger from any nation or from any combination of nations. It is impregnable to any attack that could possibly be made. There is less justification for the enormous military burdens which we are laying upon the backs of the American people than for large military appropriations by some other nations.

I have frequently said that our Nation occupies a position that gives to it moral leadership in the world. It can do more to promote world peace than perhaps any other power; and its influence, wisely and properly directed, can be and will be world-pervasive and compelling in pointing the world to a better understanding and more effective cooperation for world fellowship.

In view of the important part played by our Government in securing world ratification of the Kellogg-Briand Pact, it should in every possible way seek to make it effective and to have the nations observe not only the letter but the spirit of the same. In this period of confusion when so many irrational and dangerous forces are let loose on the world, there should be leaders to point the way out of the confusion and into the paths of safety and sanity.

As President Roosevelt said, "it is governments which have made war and not the people", and from the ranks of the people should come great leaders demanding that domestic, as well as international policies, should be formulated in the interest of peace and fellowship, rather than to develop fanatical and dangerous nationalism and selfish, narrow, and sectional policies supported by military organizations. The selfishness of individuals, and greed and disregard of the rights of others, and ambition for place and power, lead to domestic troubles and often to serious conflicts. The same is true of nations. But the peoples of the world desire to live in peace. They have not known the causes or the reasons for most of the wars that have disseminated the land. They were led blindly to the slaughter. It is time for reason and justice to direct, not alone our domestic and internal affairs, but the international policies and affairs of this and other nations.

President Coolidge declared that this whole essence of war is destructive and the negation and antithesis of human progress. He said that—

> No good things ever came out of war that could not better have been secured by reason and conscience; we do not know of any nation which has ever been able to provide arms enough so as always to be at peace. Fifteen years ago the most thoroughly equipped people in Europe were Germany and France.

These statements are self-evident, and they should be impressed upon the minds of the American people at this time. The Kellogg-Briand Pact rests upon the assumption that we should have faith in men and in nations; that people are not irresponsible creatures dedicated to ruthless destruction at the hands of each other. The Kellogg Pact has been criticized because it did not set up machinery to interpret it or to punish or restrain violations of its provisions. When sanctions have been incorporated in treaties, many persons have contended that they would prove inoperative and would be provocative of discord and trouble. That view, however, does not have universal approval. The Kellogg Pact, it is said, however, rests upon good will and upon the conscience and honor of peoples and nations. Perhaps, logically, it calls for additional international agreements that there may be greater certainty that the purpose of the treaty may be obtained.

However, it must be said that the obligation to renounce war is not a meaningless expression nor an idle gesture. It may not realize all that is expected. It may not exorcise from the hearts of men the militaristic spirit that is so often apparent; but it is a force, perhaps intangible, but nevertheless ponderable, which will increase in strength and power as the years go by. Nations have violated treaties, and in the future will be untrue to international pledges. It is equally true, however, that such violations will result in condemnation proportioned to the development of international morality and the conception of national responsibility. The world is not devoid of honor. It exists among men and is found in nations. There are those, it is true, whose conduct rests upon the philosophy of profound despair, upon the belief that life is meaningless, and that humanity consists of disorganized groups of untamed beings. I do not accept this, I was about to say, degrading philosophy; humanity is marching to higher levels and with all its mistakes and limitations it is developing higher aspirations, nobler resolves, and is guided by spiritual concepts of a purer character than those which have led nations in the past.

Public opinion will in the end compel an observance of this great treaty. Its philosophy, its morality, its high purpose, are more and more influencing men and nations. It cannot fail to succeed with public opinion supporting it. It has been said that public opinion may be a plant of slow growth, but because of that fact, there should be a greater compulsion upon the part of leaders of thought, everywhere, to give to the plant more sunlight and to the soil greater strength that it may early reach maturity.

Mr. President, before concluding, may I take the liberty of calling attention to Senate Resolution No. 20, which I submitted in March of last year, and which is now before the Committee on Foreign Relations?

The resolution reads as follows:

> Whereas permanent peace is essential to the happiness and welfare of the human race, and civilization would be jeopardized by another world war; and
>
> Whereas all people earnestly desire that international conflicts shall cease and that war shall not only be renounced as an instrument of national policy but outlawed by all civilized nations; and
>
> Whereas both political parties in their national platforms have approved our adherence to the Permanent Court of International Justice and the adoption of policies of conciliation, consultation, and conferences in case of threatened violations of treaties for the purpose of preventing war; and
>
> Whereas the cause of world peace would be advanced and made more certain by an enactment that would be an integral part of international law: Therefore be it
> Resolved, That the President be requested to enter into negotiations with all civilized nations for the purpose of securing the adoption of measures and enactments for the delegalization of war that will make the prohibition of war between sovereign nations a basic principle of international law, remove from the protection and place under the condemnation of law as an international criminal any nation that, in violation of its treaty obligations, attempts to settle disputes by war, and by which any possession or gain thereafter acquired by any other than peaceful means shall be held an illegal possession subject to recovery under such measure or law so enacted.

Undoubtedly many persons will regard the resolution as idealistic and impractical. I believe, however, the time will come when nations will adopt measures and enactments for the delegalization of war that will make the prohibition of war between sovereign nations a basic principle of international law. Municipal law has held sway among all civilized nations. Its beneficent effects are witnessed in the law and order which in most countries prevail. As its benign influence is felt, the cause of liberty and justice receives increased strength and momentum. The day will come when there will be a code of international law within which will be found enactments declaring war illegal and which will provide for the removal from the protection and place under the condemnation of law nations that in violation of treaty obligations attempt to settle disputes by war.

Mr. President, notwithstanding the overhanging clouds, we know that they will in time disappear; that the cause of justice and truth will ultimately triumph and righteousness and peace will cover the earth as the waters cover the mighty deep.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COOLIDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am under an obligation, which I am pleased to respect, to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] for a moment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I shall be very brief. I desire to express my appreciation of the courtesy extended by the Senator from Illinois in permitting me, in his time, briefly to comment upon the subject under consideration.

Mr. President, treaties of themselves do not make for world peace. The Paris Peace Pact, accepted by every important nation, does not assure peace. Something more than written instruments is necessary to make effective peace in the world.

In my opinion, in order to make effective this or any other instrument of peace, it is essential to arouse a massed world-wide opinion to agree to renounce war and to settle the differences between nations by peaceful methods.

How is this objective to be attained? By building up an effectual moral force in favor of peace and against war.

Who are the war makers? Not the average citizen; not the man on the street. The average citizen now realizes fully that the awful draft of life and impaired health caused by war is levied upon him and his children. The average citizen must be made to realize that the costs of war, the excessive tax burdens, the corruption and waste that come from war must be borne by him and his children.

Neither are the ideas which create war lodged in the breast of the average man or woman. He is not concerned about the ambitions of nations and the national jealousies and rivalries. He is not concerned about industrial differences and commercial disputes.

Therefore, if we are to have world peace, it is essential that the inarticulate average man and woman of the world be aroused to a realization that they must hail with joy every plan that tends to abolish war. Once he is fully persuaded, the toll of sacrifice and the crushing burdens of war he has to bear, and persuaded of the vast immorality of war, he will become articulate.

Peace organizations, discussions throughout the world on the part of men and women who are interested in promoting world peace, sentiments such as those expressed here today convey to the world the idea that the Paris Peace Pact is accepted seriously by the American people; that it has behind it the sanction of the American people; that the American people long for world peace; that the men and women of America realize painfully the awful consequences of war, some of which we are even now bearing.

Mr. President, I desire to take this occasion to call for a realization that the only guarantee we have of peace in the world is a massed world-wide opinion, an aroused public opinion teaching men and women to agree that war cannot and must not exist, and a public opinion that will force the statesmen of the world to accept means of arbitration in settling their disputes with each other.

Shortly after the passage of the peace pact on June 18, 1929, I had occasion to deliver an address on the subject of how to make this peace pact effective. I shall conclude what I have to say by asking that that speech may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no ojection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Almost every important nation in the world has signified its adhesion to the Kellogg Peace Pact.

To what extent is world peace made more certain by it? And what can be done to make the objectives of this pact attainable? There is no machinery created by it; there is no international court set up or league of nations to which disputes if they arise between signatories must be referred. Neither is there in this treaty any plan outlined or contemplated for disarmament, although with any real and effective renunciation of war disarmament should naturally follow.

This peace pact operates merely in the moral sphere. The nations may build their battleships, submarines, airships, maintain armies, and manufacture munitions and poisonous gases as in the past.

Even with no limits or restrictions upon spending unlimited sums of money in preparation for war, and with the existing of treaties and conventions between groups of nations to go to war under prescribed conditions, yet in my opinion it is presumptuous to assume that this treaty is worthless and that upon the arising of an issue which would arouse the jealousy and anger of a nation or nations the barrier set up against war in this treaty is so fragile that it would break down instantly.

This assumption is necessarily based upon the value of moral barriers. How powerful are they? How can they be made more powerful? Among individuals are not most barriers primarily moral and not merely the existance of policemen, prisons, courts, and judges? It is the spirit which is imbued into the moral forces of civilization which is the barrier against crime. If it was not for this spirit in the world, civilization would have been destroyed long ago.

How are these moral forces created? The moral conscience is built up in individuals by religion and education, which includes customs, traditions, laws, literature, and experience. Thus it must be with nations. Just as there is a sentiment in humanity against robbing, killing, and other serious violations, so there can be an effectual moral force built up in favor of peace and against war.

Peace can be made a powerful sentiment in the average man once he is properly informed as to its importance to civilization, and to him. Let him fully understand the new role which he must play in future wars; that the burdens of war rest chiefly upon him; that the wars of the future are to be not between armies and navies, but the airplane, the submarine, poisonous gases, and other war inventions, used, as they will be, to wipe out and destroy peoples, will be directly against the individual.

Educational forces throughout the world must be set in motion which will not only show present unsettled peace conditions of the world, but which will appeal to the enlightened self-interests of mankind.

The masses of human beings everywhere must realize who are responsible for war and center their attention upon remedies at the fountain source. Who are the war makers? The man in the street does not want war. It is he who must meet its terrible drafts of life and health; of man power and woman power and national resources, of taxes and waste and destruction; of corruption and violence and oppression.

The average citizen does not cherish the ideas that provoke war—hate and hypocrisy, fear and suspicion, industrial or commercial selfishness, deceitful propaganda, cunning and circumvention, espionage and treachery. He is guiltless of the common cause of war—ambition, envy, and national rivalry.

He knows too well what war has always meant for him and his children. He may now be inarticulate, but once he is persuaded of the vast and incurable immorality of war, he will hail with joy every argument or plan that tends to abolish it or diminish its menace. This common understanding must be made articulate. If so, it will make outlawry of war the one sentiment that is paramount to the spirit of nationalism.

Religion, all religion, must make the peace appeal. By religion I mean that natural religion to which every heart can be led to humanity; that religion that points out the criminal and immoral character of most wars and its unspeakable horrors; that religion which creates moral forces of justice and charity, to which we owe all that is permanent in our civilization. Unless religion educates the modern youth in every part of the world on solemn outlines of justice and charity, I see little hope for universal and lasting peace.

The great preventatives of wars, unfortunately, in the past have not found lodging in the world of statesmanship where wars usually originate. Once the plain men and women the world over are imbued with the educational and spiritual ideals of peace, and their power is internationally coordinated, they will demand from their statesmen good faith; that is, honesty in purpose and expression and a realization that no cause is ever settled until it is settled rightly; and that human beings are fallible and, therefore, we must observe the Golden Rule and deal with our neighbor as we want him to deal with us.

Care should be exercised in distinguishing between the principles of peace and the instruments which have been, or may be, set up to govern the international political agencies for peace. The international peace instruments which have been set up do not renounce war; in fact, one of the objections made in America to these instruments which have been set up was that they recognized and supported the doctrine of force as a means to peace.

Whatever differences there may be over the efficaciousness of these international institutions, there should be no difference in arousing a massed world-wide opinion to agree to renounce war and to settle the differences between nations by peaceful methods. This massed opinion will give a moral sanction to the Kellogg Peace Pact that will outlaw from the society of nations those governments which break their solemn obligation to settle their differences by peaceful means. Such an awakening of the intelligent public opinion of the world will make war internationally impossible and give the necessary moral sanction to this peace pact.

Particularly will it be found easy to create this moral and massed sentiment for peace among the smaller nations. They have special reasons for promoting a powerful international sentiment directed against war. It is the so-called great powers who particularly possess the ambitions, rivalries, and jealousies that lead to war, and the small nations well know that once they resort to war they have no respect for the rights of the smaller nations. The small nations have nothing to gain by war, neither has the average man or woman; both are economically paralyzed and injured by war; both, very naturally, should be most eager to create a world sentiment powerful and effective enough to make even the mightiest nation hesitate before violating the solemn pledge not to resort to war to settle its disputes.

The education for peace sentiment must be vigorously carried on among the so-called "great powers." Every effort should be made to bring about agreements for disarmament among them; also to force the statesmen of these nations to recognize that the moral obligations behind a treaty for peace must be as binding as a treaty for war. Once the great powers are made to realize that their subjects are both loyal nationalists, and at the same time good peace internationalists, we will have convinced the statesmen of the great powers that the sentiment that war is evil is compelling and controlling.

We must fully understand that force cannot suddenly or promptly be eradicated. It is folly to believe that the great powers can be persuaded at once to disarm their armies and dismantle their navies and trust each other merely to settle differences between them by arbitration. We must search for some substitute for national armies and navies to adequately protect the rights, dignity, and territory of the respective nations. Already considerations of such plans are being made. My own belief is that with the peace movement and with the continuation of the burdens of taxation for war purposes upon the people that disarmament will naturally and inevitably follow, just as disarmament of individuals followed upon the establishment and maintenance of law-enforcing officials. Disarmament, or at least much of it, is inevitable as a result of the inculcation of principles of peace among the people of the world.

There are three positions one can take on the peace pact. Those who prefer war, of course, are consistent, at least, in expressing contempt for peace treaties. Those who think war is inevitable may be excused by considering the Kellogg Peace Pact despicable in their eyes. Those who know from experience how greatly peoples and nations suffer in war and who realize that peoples and nations cannot fail to suffer greviously from a great war in the future cannot take any other attitude than insisting that this pact be taken seriously; that it is not a piece of hypocrisy; and that politicians and statesmen must not break it.

Let us look upon this pact as a turning of the nations of the world from their war sprees and their decision to take a pledge, partly because they have learned how much their quarrels injure themselves and partly from genuine remorse, if not from higher motives. The pledge takers should be encouraged rather than discouraged to mend their ways. We should help them to keep their pledge instead of shouting that we know the pledge will not be kept. The attitude of being willing to do nothing to make nations keep their pledge is unworthy.

The wise course for all to take with regard to this treaty is simple and clear. Idealism and policy, our own interests, and the interests of the world all coincide in making our course plain. Granting even that the motives of many of the nations that led them to the signing of the treaty were extremely mixed, it should, nevertheless, be our endeavor to bring all support we can to those forces in the world which are striving to make this treaty a reality. Any other course means the pact must fail, as well as every other effort for peace. On the other hand, if the peoples of the world show that they expect and intend this treaty to be taken seriously, then statesmen and politicians will be less likely to break it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] desires to occupy the floor upon the particular subject now before the Senate. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I appreciate the courtesy of the Senator from Illinois in permitting these discussions to continue before he begins his address, and I shall not trespass upon that courtesy for more than a few minutes.

This treaty marked a great advance for the cause of peace. The difficulty of maintaining the treaty is that the rulers of some nations may not observe it. I have long believed that the only way to prevent war is to make it impossible for any great nation of the world to begin a war until the people of the country whose rulers want war have been allowed to vote upon it.

Some years ago at each session of Congress, I introduced joint resolutions proposing that the Constitution of the United States be amended so that this country could not begin a war without a vote of the people. I was always met with the argument that it would be impracticable to require this country to be bound not to begin a war until the people had voted on it, if other nations were not under a similar restriction. I recognized the weight of that argument. Nevertheless, I believe it is a principle that is the only effective principle under which we can prevent future wars. The Senator from Massachusetts speaks of arousing public opinion, but it is so much easier to arouse public opinion to follow the rulers of a country when they begin war than it is to arouse the people to be against them. But if we could have international treaties under which every great nation in the world would bind itself not to begin a war, not to permit its army to cross the borders, as President Roosevelt said a few evenings ago, I think it would be a long time before there would be another war among the great nations of the world.

I have for some time wanted to put into the RECORD a quotation I found from Woodrow Wilson regarding the World War. It impressed me so deeply, possibly because of my own experiences in connection with the declaration of that war, that I would like to put it into the RECORD. It is a part of an address delivered by President Wilson following his trip to Europe. It was delivered at St. Louis. I quote these words:

> Why, my fellow citizens, is there any man here or any woman, let me say is there any child here, who does not know that the seeds of war in the modern world are industrial and commercial rivalry? The real reason that the war we have just finished took place was that Germany was afraid her commercial rivals were going to get the better of her, and the reason why some nations went into the war against Germany was that they thought Germany would get the commercial advantage of them. The seed of the jealousy, the seed of the deep-seated hatred was hot, successful commercial and industrial rivalry. * * * This war in its inception was a commercial and industrial war; it was not a political war.

Mr. President, I believe the same forces of industrial and commercial rivalry which brought on that war are working in the world today. Yet I am amazed at the methods by which they work. I am told by those who have been in Japan that the Japanese people are worked into a military fervor against the United States by being told that the United States is likely to attack Japan, and that they must be prepared to defend themselves against the United States. Here in the United States we are told that we are in danger of being attacked by Japan. If an attempt were made to build up an army and navy in this country on the basis of attacking Japan, everyone knows how futile that would be, and for anyone to go to Japan and try to build up an army and navy there on the theory that she should attack the United States, I believe would be equally futile. But these theories are reversed, and thus there is abroad throughout the nations of the world today a prediction to the effect that the United States and Japan are about to go to war.

I have here an article by Roy Mathew Frisen, appearing in the Readers' Digest for December 1933, taken from the Forum, entitled "Japanophobia", which expresses this thought so well that I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD at this point in my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Readers' Digest, December 1933]

JAPANOPHOBIA

(Condensed from the Forum by Ray Mathew Frisen)

Millions of words have been written on the possibility of war with Japan. We have had impressed upon our minds that Japan is a beehive of industry, feverishly preparing for Der Tag, when she will in one fell swoop seize the Philippines, take the Hawaiian Islands in stride, wipe out our Battle Fleet, blow up the Panama Canal, and with a huge fleet of airplanes bomb every city, village, and haystack in the Pacific States.

In the face of this horrible menace we are said to be helpless. We are solemnly assured that our Navy is rusting into unserviceability; that our national defense is dangerously like a combined boy-scout and sea-scout organization, pretty, but ineffective as a fighting machine. What we need is more ships, more sailors, more planes, more soldiers, more everything. But why insist we need them to oppose Japan?

War between the United States and Japan is possible, but exceedingly improbable. Why should the little empire of Asia, 5,000 miles away, seek to attack us, one of the largest, strongest nations on earth, whose wealth exceeds her own tenfold?

It is perfectly true the Japanese have real cause for sullenness and distrust toward America. Our action in frustrating Japan's program of seizing eastern Siberia after the World War to establish a buffer state against Russia is fresh in the minds of present-day Japanese. This culminated in a sharp demand upon the Japanese Government by our Secretary of State to withdraw many of her troops from Siberia, and was followed by a more threatening attitude in 1920 and 1921, when, at the demand of the United States, Japan entirely gave up her Siberian campaign.

Another blow was the exclusion clause in the Immigration Act of 1924, which rubbed the Japanese raw and dipped them in brine. The Japanese smarted then and still do, though with decreased intensity, at an obnoxious law that implies that they are racially inferior. And more recently, Japan felt resentment when the United States joined with the League of Nations in condemning her Manchurian campaign.

The continuous flood of anti-Japanese material in the United States is closely watched by Japanese jingoes, who use it to persuade the people that Japan is facing a very real "American menace." They actually have more reason to fear us than we have them. And our muscle-flexing moves in the Pacific have not helped matters any. Many Japanese are genuinely concerned as to whether we have imperialistic ambitions in the Orient. If so, they reason, wouldn't we wipe out Japan first, as our chief obstacle?

Yet we know that there is no danger of our launching a campaign of aggression against Japan. And Japan could never afford to attack us. She is dependent for her economic existence upon her foreign trade, which is dwindling rapidly. The United States is her best customer, taking from 40 to 45 percent of her total exports. Japan cannot afford to cut her throat economically by throwing off the income from America. The trade with Manchukuo will have no compensatory effect for many years to come, and the raw materials in Manchukuo cannot soon supplant those in the United States.

War with the United States would demand enormous expenditures. Japan could not finance so vast an undertaking, and, considering the gamble, it is doubtful if any other nation would lend her money or credit. The national debt of Japan has doubled in the past dozen years and promises to increase further. She is in dire financial straits, with little improvement in sight.

Thus, alone and unaided, even without the threat of attack from enemies on the Asiatic coast, Japan could not hope to achieve the impossible. Even if her powerful fleet could capture the Philippine Islands and land on several of the main islands of the Hawaiian group, Japan could never reach the mainland United States without first blowing our fleet off the high seas, and in that case her strength would have been nearly spent upon reaching coastal waters. If Japan caught us unawares in an initial massed attack, we might be forced to the defensive until we were fully mobilized. But eventually we could leisurely retake the captured islands and move on to Japan in retaliation. From every standpoint—money, resources, man power, position, and support—Japan has no chance in a death struggle with us. It is not necessary to peek into the secret files of the Japanese Government to learn that aggression is not planned against us. The obvious, external facts tell us that it is well-nigh impossible.

Consider also another aspect. In 1895 Japan thrashed China, and China since then has carefully kept alive the spark of enmity for Japan and all things Japanese.

Nippon's activities in Manchuria and Shanghai have fanned that spark into a fierce flame of deadly hatred that may be hidden but not quenched. Japan completely routed the Russians in 1905 and thwarted their efforts in taking over Manchuria to acquire a warm-water port on the Pacific. The Soviet Russians inherited the old hatred for things Japanese and are diligently preparing to get their revenge. Russia knows she lost the campaign in Asia because her army fought at the end of a rickety, single-track railroad 4,000 miles from the source of supply. Today the reds have over a third of a million troops quartered in eastern Siberia, have stored huge amounts of war supplies near the Manchurian border, and are rapidly double-tracking the Trans-Siberian Railroad. When Russia is ready Japan will have her hands full, and she knows it.

Japan is fully aware that unless a miracle prevents she will be forced to fight to the finish an awakened and organized China and a tremendously powerful Russia, the first and third largest countries in population and first and second in geographical area. Combined, they outnumber her over 6 to 1 in manpower and have inexhaustible resources. Only through energetic preparation can Japan hope to save herself from annihilation.

Japan is building a huge navy. She is building fighting planes and training pilots. She puts her conscript army through winter maneuvers no other nation would dare attempt; this to accustom her troops to unbelievable hardship of the sort they might meet on the north Asian field of battle. She is establishing a buffer state on the Asiatic Continent and planting an army there. She is doing this, and more, but not one move is necessarily being made with the ultimate aim of a war with the United States.

In the event Japan went to war with us there would be prompt action by China to recover Manchuria. Soviet Russia would doubtless lose no time releasing the military catapult she has been industriously winding up on the borders that hem in half of Manchukuo. Beset on all sides by powerful antagonists, what chance would Japan have of delivering a telling blow at the United States?

Japan as a snarling menace to our national security, ready to pounce upon us with bared fangs? Ridiculous. Let us use our good, old, common, American horse sense. Suppose that, instead of fostering suspicion and hatred of Japan, we bend our intelligent efforts to cultivating her good will and cooperation.

Mr. DILL. I also have here an article appearing in the Readers' Digest for December 1933, condensed from the publication known as "The Way of Escape", by Sir Philip Gibbs, entitled "What Youth Doesn't Know About War", which I should also like to have printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Readers' Digest, December 1933]

WHAT YOUTH DOESN'T KNOW ABOUT WAR

(Condensed from The Way of Escape, by Sir Philip Gibbs)

It is only to the younger generation that the question of peace or war is vitally important. We older people do not matter much. If there is another war, most of us won't go to it. But youth should get busy now about this problem of war and not leave it entirely to the old men who are at present dealing with it, because they may set traps into which the younger generation will fall.

The war spirit is not to be exorcised out of young minds by fear. All the war books and war films have done more harm than good by exciting the imagination of young minds and thrilling them with a sense of enormous adventure. When the World War began great numbers of young men had that same sense of adventure—of an exultation which was not without spiritual beauty. Millions of them, mostly boys, really, were uplifted by an emotionalism which was perhaps as high as human nature may attain. They believed they were fighting for ideals beyond self-interest; they got their ticket for the slaughterhouse and marched toward the battlefields gladly, on fire with the passion of patriotism.

These young recruits had imagined a warfare in which courage would count. But this war was not that kind. The human being hardly counted at all when crouched in a trench or herded into a dugout, because something else, inhuman, was the real enemy. It was not a war between men and men. It was a war between machines and machines, and men were just blood and pulp for that mass production of death.

Yes; it was strangely inhuman! I met a French general once who had commanded a division for 2 years on the hills above Rheims. From his dugout he could see the German lines, every detail of them clear through his telescope, every sandbag visible, every strand of barbed wire etched on his vision. But he had never seen a German. Never once!

Again, I saw a German counterattack strangely close. They came out of a place we called Lousy Wood. They wheeled round to face the English battalions invisible in the trenches. As each line advanced it was mowed down, exactly as if sliced by a knife. Then another line came out of the wood, wheeled, advanced, and fell. They never saw an English soldier.

In modern machine-made war—at least under heavy barrage fire—soldiers are no longer men. They are merely bundles of quivering nerves under the flail of explosive shells. They can do nothing about it. They cannot even strike an heroic attitude. What courage they have at such times is only passive, like that of martyrs in the torture chamber.

This is merely a little reminder to youth that in the last war human motives, purposes, ideals—even its hatreds—were overwhelmed by the monstrous mechanism of a business which was superhuman in its effects.

What good came out of it for any nation? What did the Germans hope to gain? More customers for their manufactured goods? But after declaring war they killed their customers and ruined themselves. All nations declared it was a war of defense. How idiotic to defend themselves with a suicide pact destroying all their reserves of wealth!

The last war settled no arguments for any length of time. The French stilled feared the Germans. The Germans still hated the French—with an even greater hatred. After the war there are more causes of quarrel between nations than there were before—many smoldering fires which may burst into a general conflagration unless stamped out by a younger generation advancing to some new goal of civilization.

Youth knows that war is dangerous. But youth, yearning for adventure, does not know that war is damned silly; that it is the last resort of the fool and the mob, the great chance for the wooden head under the brass hat; that it is the denial of life's beauty and our best code of decency. The younger minds today must decide for themselves whether they think this kind of war, or any other, is worthwhile for any purpose whatever.

There cannot be a complete abandonment of force until human nature changes more than a little, and until the ideals of civilization are world wide. But we can envisage at least the limitation of armies and fleets to defensive and police purposes, governed by the allegiance of nations to a code of international law. That is the way of advance, and that is the task of a new, youthful leadership for which the best intelligence of the world is waiting.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have believed for many years that the best settlement we could make of our oriental troubles, and the danger of trouble with Japan, would be to invite the nations most deeply concerned in the Orient to guarantee the independence of the Philippines. If the United States should get out of the Philippines, I believe the chances of armed conflict with Japan would be diminished 90 percent. I believe that if this Government would appeal to the British Government and to the Japanese Government to join in a tripartite agreement with those nations that we would give the Philippines their independence if these three nations would guarantee to maintain that independence, such an organization could be developed, and we could leave the Philippines honorably. At the same time there would be complete safety of the investments of people who are there, and we would remove what I think is the greatest possible cause of trouble with Japan.

Mr. President, I shall not take more time now. I have made this statement because I could not sit silent when the Paris peace treaty was being discussed without voicing the views which I have held so long, and for which I have always stood, and for which I shall always stand, namely, that war is the organized assassination and murder of men, glorified by history, and made to appeal to the youth of the world, presented in a way to lead them to think that they can find glory, that they can find a career, in war, yet proving all the time that they can never create or find anything except a shambles and a grave.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am conscious of the fact that the discussion on the treaty involving what we speak of as the St. Lawrence waterway being opened by me, adverse to the treaty, and honorable Senators who are in favor of it will take a great deal of time, taken all together; therefore the opportunity to present these suggestions and thoughts to be intimated by Senators on other subjects which are not immediately before the Senate I do not feel should be denied them, and for that reason I yield to the Senator from Texas, who has some suggestions concerning the President's message, which is likewise itself before the Senate, as was the Paris Peace Treaty, alluded to by the other Senators. Then I will take the floor in pursuit of the executive session, the order of the day.

VALUATION OF THE DOLLAR—THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas expresses his gratitude to the able and distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] for his indulgence in permitting the Senator from Texas to make just a few brief remarks with regard to the message just sent to the Senate by the President of the United States.

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas takes particular gratification in the message of the President. The Senator from Texas is very happy that the President has adopted the course which he has adopted with regard to reducing the gold content of the dollar, and taken other necessary steps to make revaluation of the gold dollar effective.

May I call to the attention of the Senate the fact that, on the 24th of January 1933, the Senator from Texas spoke in the Senate on the subject of the revaluation of the gold dollar, and, among other things, the Senator then said the following:

> Mr. President, every plan for inflation, whether it be through the issuance of paper currency or through the remonetization of silver, has for its purpose the reduction of the value of the gold dollar. That is the purpose and the object of every plan for monetary inflation—to bring down the value of the gold dollar.

That is, to bring down the value of the dollar, and gold being the basis of our currency, of course, that is what it meant. The Senator from Texas further said:

> Mr. President, I submit that if the purpose of proposed legislation is to reduce the value of the gold dollar, the best and most practical way of reducing the value of the gold dollar is to reduce the value of the gold dollar, not indirectly, not by a backstairs method, not by going around and climbing in the kitchen window, but by the exercise of the sovereign power of the Congress vested in the Congress by the Constitution to coin money and—to do what? Not to fix its value but to coin money and to regulate its value.

Mr. President, among other things the Senator from Texas said this:

> Mr. President, my own idea as to how much the gold dollar should be reduced is not absolutely fixed, but, on the basis of present values and the indices of commodity prices, my view would be that it ought to be about 65 or 66⅔ percent of the present amount of gold in the gold dollar.

Of course, conditions have changed somewhat with relation to values at this time. The Senator from Texas further said:

> It is said that this action is drastic. Mr. President, it may be drastic, but we are faced by a drastic condition. This is a case that is going to require a major operation. No absent treatment, no faith cure, no legerdemain is going to bring back health and sanity to the commerce and industry of the United States. It is going to require a major operation. I am firmly of the view that the best plan looking toward inflation yet proposed is that of revaluing the gold dollar.

The Senator from Texas also said:

> I lay down the challenge here and now for Senators to point out either the lack of legal authority of the Congress or absence of the economic necessity for the plan which I now suggest, of revaluing the gold dollar on a ratio comparable to the prices of other commodities and other values in the United States.

In conclusion the Senator from Texas then said:

> Mr. President, the power to regulate the value of money is one of the paramount powers of the Congress. It is superior to the right of any individual. It is superior to the right of all of the individuals in the United States, if they could be gathered together. It is a constitutional grant to the Congress; and the Constitution trusts the Congress to use its patriotism, its sense of justice, its wisdom, not so to revalue the dollar as to be unjust to the creditor or unjust to any other class. It is a power that the Constitution grants to Congress in the expectation that Congress, with due deference to the general welfare, with a solemn respect for the oath which its Members took, and in the presence of all of the high powers under the Constitution will perform its duty in revaluing money, and revaluing it justly and fairly. There is no question of morals involved, unless Senators in their own hearts vote for such a revaluation as is not just and fair under all of the circumstances and in consideration of all other factors and values of commodities.
> Mr. President, at some future date I shall ask leave of the Senate to deliver some other remarks with regard to different aspects of this question, particularly with respect to the constitutional and legal features. At the present time I yield the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I have a conundrum to propound to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I yielded to the Senator, not to expound conundrums, but for the purpose of propounding simple questions. A simple question is the only kind of question the Senator from Texas ever undertakes to answer.

Mr. FESS. My question will be a simple question. Suppose the policy should be the devaluation of the gold dollar at 50 cents and I have a dollar in my pocket; after it is devalued, what is it worth, 50 cents, or $2?

Mr. CONNALLY. What kind of dollar has the Senator?

Mr. FESS. A silver dollar. Suppose it is a silver dollar, or suppose it is a gold dollar, or suppose it is a paper dollar.

Mr. CONNALLY. I refuse to talk about three kinds of dollars at one time. If the Senator has any particular kind of dollar to which he will direct his question, I shall endeavor to answer.

Mr. FESS. Any kind of dollar. I will say to the Senator that I am serious about the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Senator has a gold dollar in his pocket, and he can keep out of jail under the order of the President to return that gold to the Treasury, and if the Senator can go anywhere and cash in the gold dollar, the Senator can get $2 for it; but if it is a paper dollar or a silver dollar, the Senator can get only $1 for it. Do I make myself clear?

Mr. FESS. The answer is not clear.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is the Senator sure that the answer is not clear, or is it the understanding of the answer that is not clear?

Mr. FESS. I wish to know from the Senator if, after this policy is invoked, I have a dollar, that dollar is worth 50 cents, or is it worth $2?

Mr. CONNALLY. That dollar is worth a dollar, because it is still only a dollar.

Mr. FESS. In other words, 50 cents is a dollar? [Laughter.]

Mr. CONNALLY. No. The Senator from Ohio wishes to answer his own question.

Mr. FESS. No. I am in earnest about it.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know the Senator is.

Mr. FESS. I have asked half a dozen Senators about it. What would that dollar be worth after this policy is adopted?

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me say to the Senator——

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Illinois yielded to the Senator from Texas for the purpose of making a few brief remarks. I ask for the regular order, which is the speech of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. CONNALLY. I have violated the rule in yielding to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PITTMAN. Pending that matter I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not yield for that purpose, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. If the Senator is not quite through, I will defer.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall be through in a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I shall be through in a moment.

Mr. LEWIS. I have no complaint to make in this particular matter, Mr. President. I became completely dazed in this matter, which is so complicated, by reason of so many kinds of dollars—more dollars than I have ever heard of in my existence. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. President, this is not the first time the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] has interrupted while I was making remarks; in the speech I made on the 24th of January 1933 the Senator from Ohio interrupted a number of times, as the RECORD will show.

Let me say this, Mr. President, to the Senator from Ohio. If he has a paper dollar or a silver dollar, it will be worth only a dollar after revaluation. If he should have a dollar's worth of gold bullion and the Attorney General did not have him put in jail for not turning that gold in, and if the Senator could get it into the Treasury, or anywhere else, that gold would be worth $2, because he can sell that gold now for more than a dollar. The Senator says he cannot understand this question. The present market for gold is $34 an ounce. There are only 23 grains of gold to the gold dollar, and the value of an ounce of gold was $20.67. So if the Senator now has a gold dollar and he will slip out behind the house somewhere and melt it, and if he can go down and make the Treasury believe that it is new gold just mined, he can get $34 and something for a $20 gold piece.

Mr. FESS. That is too much trouble.

Mr. CONNALLY. I know that; but that answers the Senator's question. I submit I have answered the question. The Senator seems to confuse the issue; the Senator does not want to understand; and no head is so thick and no understanding is so dumb as that of one who does not want light. [Laughter.]

ASSISTANCE OF EXPERT FROM STATE DEPARTMENT

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois if he will yield?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Mr. President.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, it is customary in such matters as this under discussion to call on experts to assist Members of the Senate with any information that may be required. I have asked that a representative of the State Department be assigned to the Committee on Foreign Relations, so that any treaty or other document of that kind which we wish to have before us may be obtained without delay. I also ask unanimous consent that the expert who may be assigned by the State Department to the Committee on Foreign Relations be allowed to sit on the floor during this particular time, for the purpose of assisting any Senator with regard to any information that may be required from the State Department.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask if it is the intention of the Senator from Nevada to have an expert here from the War Department who will have in his possession the late reports of the Army engineers on this subject?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not have any objection, Mr. President, to any experts who can throw any light on the subject. If anyone has the slightest objection to the request I have just made, I will withdraw it.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of suggesting the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Couzens	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAYS TREATY

The Senate, in executive session, and as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

[Mr. LEWIS addressed the Senate. His speech is printed entire in RECORD of Jan. 17.]

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two editorials relating to the pending St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty, one of which appeared in the Detroit News of Friday, January 12, and the other of which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer of the same date.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Detroit News, Jan. 12, 1934]

ROOSEVELT ON THE SEAWAY

On the basis of Mr. Roosevelt's pitiless arraignment of false issues and plain statement of real issues the attitude of every Senator becomes visible and comprehensible to his constituents. It will take more than a padded pamphlet of lying propaganda to persuade the American people that the President of the United States doesn't know whereof he speaks.

Perhaps the statement in Roosevelt's message most striking to public attention—the only sort of statement making appeal to a certain type of mind—is that if the treaty is not ratified, Canada can complete the deep-sea waterway within her own boundary, while the United States cannot. That so far as the St. Lawrence River is concerned, the people of New York State are unable to draw vast hydropower from the international section without a treaty with Canada, while Canada has great power sites wholly within the Canadian section. Incidentally, Canada, in constructing the new canals in the international and Canadian sections, whether under this treaty or not, is discarding an existing investment of $50,000,000 in canals which will then be made obsolete.

Canada, with a population of scarcely 10,000,000, is bold and sure about these things. The United States, with more than 120,000,000, is sometimes afraid it is not getting enough of the best end of the deal. What the President advocates is a fair deal as between the United States and Canada and that, as he makes incisively clear, is to be found in the treaty now before the Senate.

His vision of the seaway and its part in a national plan for utilization of all available resources is the vision for which every American should strive if this Nation is to go forward and the new philosophy of general economic security is to be built into the everyday life and welfare of the average man. Moreover, so wholly national is this project which is now earnestly demanded by a Democratic President, that it was introduced first by President Hoover and a Republican administration, and that administration saw the treaty completed and signed it. There can be, then, no party politics in the issue whatever.

There is no reason, based on public policy, why the seaway should not be completed. If there had been any such reason, the President would have stated it.

There is every reason of economy, policy, public welfare why the seaway should be completed. The President has stated them.

If the wishes and interests and labors of more than 42,000,000 inhabitants of this country mean anything, then the treaty must be ratified. Let the Senate hear from them.

[From the Cleveland Plain Dealer, Jan. 12, 1934]

RATIFY THE TREATY!

Thirty-three votes in the United States Senate are enough to reject the St. Lawrence Treaty. Opponents of the pact claim 50 votes against it.

Somebody is guessing far from the facts. Our own surmise is that the enemies of the waterway have nowhere near the strength they pretend to think they have.

Opposition to the treaty is a compound of elements each hostile for its own particular reason. Chicago, long an advocate of the waterway, is against this treaty because the treaty proposes to limit the city's diversion of water from Lake Michigan in accordance with the terms of the United States Supreme Court decree. Railroads oppose it because they fear the competition of waterborne commerce. Power companies fight it because they object to having a great volume of cheap, new power thrown on the market. New Orleans and the lower Mississippi fight it because they fear loss of business if the Lakes are opened to the sea.

Against this heterogeneous opposition appears a compact body of economic and engineering opinion that the opening of this great new trade route will confer a lasting benefit on the whole country, and particularly on the industrial-agricultural Mid West. The proposal has been submitted to every conceivable test and been approved unanimously by every Government group that ever studied it.

Twenty-three States centering at the Great Lakes but extending as far west as Oregon and as far south as Kentucky comprise the council of States working for the waterway. Any Senator from any of these States now voting to reject the treaty will be setting up his own judgment against that of his own people back home. Ohio has long been a member of this council.

The treaty allows Chicago a larger diversion of water than, in the opinion of Government engineers, often repeated, is needed for the adequate and efficient operation of the Illinois bargeway. Chicago's insistence on a still more generous diversion indicates a purpose ultimately to override the will of the Supreme Court. Chicago wants the excess of water, not for navigation nor primarily for sewage disposal but for power she hopes to develop for her own profit from water that belongs to two Nations.

Midwest taxpayers have cheerfully supported such projects as the Panama Canal and many large expenditures of Federal money along the Atlantic coast of no direct or apparent advantage to the interior States. If the St. Lawrence were put on a purely sectional basis, the Lake States could rightfully insist that the East and the far South should, in mere fairness, reciprocate now by sustaining the great waterway.

No such argument need be made. The St. Lawrence is a national, not a sectional, improvement whose benefits will be widely scattered. It is a major element in the Roosevelt "new deal."

CONVENTION FOR THE REGULATION OF AERIAL NAVIGATION

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair) laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Inasmuch as the countries that are parties to the International Convention for the Regulation of Aerial Navigation of October 13, 1919, have adopted a number of amendments to the convention since it was sent to the Senate on June 16, 1926 (Executive O, 69th Cong., 1st sess.), the instrument now in force differs from the convention in the form in which it was submitted to the Senate.

I, therefore, request the return of the convention with the accompanying papers for consideration in connection with the amendments that have been made.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the treaty and papers be returned as requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the President is granted.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND TURKEY

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Due to changed conditions affecting its provisions since signature, I withdraw from the Senate the treaty to regulate the general relations between the United States and Turkey, signed at Lausanne, Switzerland, on August 6, 1923, which was sent to the Senate by President Coolidge on May 3, 1924, with a view to receiving advice and consent to ratification (Senate Confidential Document—Executive Z, 68th Cong., 1st sess.).

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 12, 1934.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I take it that the withdrawal is simply notice to the Senate that the President has constitutional authority to withdraw it and does withdraw it. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate recognize the withdrawal of the treaty by the President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

COMMISSIONER OF LABOR STATISTICS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order. The clerk will read the first nomination on the calendar.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Isador Lubin, of the District of Columbia, to be Commissioner of Labor Statistics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the confirmation of the nomination?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the able Senator from Arkansas that inasmuch as there has been no notice of an executive session——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But we have been in executive session for 2 days.

Mr. McNARY. There has been no notice of a call of the Executive Calendar. I think we should have a better attendance if the Executive Calendar is to be called and I would therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is quite late in the afternoon and I would prefer to take a recess until tomorrow, rather than to have a quorum called at this time.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WAGNER. Is the Senator from Oregon objecting to consideration of the nomination of Isador Lubin?

Mr. McNARY. No; but I am objecting to a call of the Executive Calendar at this time without notice that we were to have such a call. I think we should have either a quorum call or a postponement of the Executive Calendar. That is all.

Mr. WAGNER. Would the Senator object if I were to ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration?

Mr. McNARY. Oh, yes; that would come within the prohibition, too.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In order to avoid a controversy about the matter and the delay incident to the calling of a quorum, I shall in a few moments move that the Senate stand in recess until tomorrow at noon, but before doing so I give notice now that it is expected that the Executive Calendar will be called tomorrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed, without amendment, the bill (S. 2125) to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes.

EXPENSES OF SECOND SESSION OF SEVENTY-THIRD CONGRESS

As in legislative session,

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate, House Joint Resolution 228, which is the usual resolution with respect to the mileage of Senators and Members of the House. I ask that the House joint resolution may be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The joint resolution (H.J.Res. 228) to provide for certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GLASS. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably, without amendment, the joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress, namely:

SENATE

For mileage of Senators, $38,250.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

For mileage of Representatives, the Delegate from Hawaii, and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, and for expenses of the Delegate from Alaska and the Resident Commissioners from the Philippines Islands, $131,250.

For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, including $4,400 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $44,000, to be available for expenditures notwithstanding the provisions of section 304 of the act of June 30, 1932 (47 Stat. 408), as continued and made applicable to the fiscal year 1934 by section 4 (a), Title II, of the act of March 20, 1933 (48 Stat. 13): Provided, That from such sum each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall be allowed $90 for stationery allowance or commutation therefor.

EMPLOYMENT STATISTICS

As in legislative session,

Mr. FESS. I submit a resolution and ask the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to it. I should like to have it considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not object to the present consideration of the resolution, but I should like to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The legislative clerk read the resolution (S.Res. 138), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor is requested to furnish to the Senate at the earliest practicable date the following information: (1) The number of persons employed during the month of November 1929, the month of November 1932, the month of November 1933, and, so far as available, the month of January 1934, in producing capital or durable goods, and the number employed in producing consumptive goods; (2) the number of persons employed during the same periods in producing all types of goods, and the number employed in furnishing services; (3) the number of persons employed during the same periods in private industry and on private enterprises, and the number employed on emergency public or semipublic enterprises; and (4) so far as possible, the extent of the unemployment during the same periods in each category set forth above.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The resolution submitted by the Senator from Ohio calls for information, and, in my opinion, it may require a considerable expenditure in order to assemble the data. Indeed, I am not informed as to whether all the data are available, and, therefore, whether it will be necessary to collect a portion of the information desired. For this reason I think the resolution should go to a committee in order that an investigation may be made. The information called for is important.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator desires the resolution to go to a committee, of course, I cannot object. I should like to state that, in my opinion, the key to the situation is what we call "capital goods." If the employment of labor in capital-goods production is increasing, it is very promising evidence; it would indicate an improved condition. If the labor in those particular lines is decreasing, I think it would indicate a very serious condition. I should like to have the information. I think it would be very valuable, if it can be collected, as I suppose it can be.

If the Senator has the resolution go to a committee, I hope the committee will not bury it. I am very anxious to obtain the information, and I think every other Senator should like to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. As I have said, the information called for seems to be important. It is only the fact that I am in doubt as to whether it is available without much work and a considerable expenditure of money that prompts me to ask that the resolution go to a committee. With the approval of the Senator from Ohio, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

AMENDMENT OF VETERANS' REGULATION (H.DOC. NO. 217)

As in legislative session,

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith certified copies of Executive Order No. 6547 (Veterans' Regulation No. 2 (b)) approved by me on January 2, 1934.

This veterans' regulation amended Veterans' Regulation No. 2 (a) approved by me on July 28, 1933, and was issued in accordance with the terms of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 15, 1934.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

The Senate, in executive session, and as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the treaty between the United States and the Dominion of Canada for the completion of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, signed July 18, 1932.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate stand in recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p.m.) the Senate, in executive session, took a recess until tomorrow, Tuesday, January 16, 1934, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATION

Executive nomination received by the Senate January 15 (legislative day of Jan. 11,) 1934

UNITED STATES ATTORNEY

James O. Carr, of North Carolina, to be United States attorney, eastern district of North Carolina, to succeed Walter Harrison Fisher, whose term expired January 13, 1934.

CONFIRMATION

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate January 15 (legislative day of Jan. 11,) 1934

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE

Sumner Welles to be Assistant Secretary of State.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1934

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, we pray for the fellowship of Him who was nobly singular, yet divinely virtuous. In His name we wait on Thee. We seek no slumbering admissions or crippled purposes, but rather that strength which energizes, constrains, and transforms. O let such power flash forth, revealing an understanding of our duty that waxes into noonday clearness. Again we wait; our hearts stir; may they feel no pain. O God of love, bless unto us the memory of mother dear and inspire us to practice her gentle wisdom in a world that so often loses its joys and its treasures. Everywhere do Thou shelter our land until:

Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree and instead of the briar shall come up the myrtle tree.

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a short statement by N. K. Carnes, of St. Paul, manager of the Central Cooperative Association, the largest cooperative association in this country, in regard to the inequities of the processing tax now in force between the producer and the consumer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Reserving the right to object, I do not see the minority leader on the floor. Is the gentleman requesting the insertion of a statement by some private citizen?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. This is an official, a manager of the concern. I believe the meat packers of this country are entitled to a profit on their operations, but it does not seem just and fair that they should enjoy all the profits and leave the stock producer to operate at a great loss.

During the past month, and I believe everyone will agree with me, the prices paid for live hogs have reached the lowest point in 50 years. Top hogs have sold as low as $2.85 per hundredweight at South St. Paul. Everyone knows that this price is away below the cost of production. Today the farmer can borrow from the Government 45 cents per bushel on his corn consumed, and the past year has been a very profitable one for the meat packers of this country. Swift & Co.'s yearbook shows a net income for that company for the year of $10,149,582.22. These figures that I wish to be inserted in the RECORD are rather interesting because this same source of information last year showed a loss of $5,337,788.81.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Reserving the right to object, is this an objection to the processing tax being placed on meat and meat products?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Not exactly; but to see to it that the farmers shall get some of the benefits. This shows the net earnings of Armour & Co. for the year and also the Rath Packing Co., of Waterloo, Iowa, and other great packing concerns in this country.

If I may depart for a moment and state that the importation of fats and oils, duty free, from the Philippine Islands is decreasing the demand for various fats and oils produced in this country, that during July, August, and September of 1932 we imported from the Philippine Islands 152,000,000 pounds of coconut oil and copra, while during the same period in 1933 this quantity increased to 280,000,000 pounds, and it should be impressed that the coconut oil which has come into this country during this 3-month period amounts to as much beef tallow as that produced by three million 1,000-pound prime steers, or putting this on a per-month basis, 1,000,000 steers a month.

Mr. McCLINTIC. My attention has been called to the fact that there will be an attempt to make livestock a basic commodity. Is this in the nature of an objection to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. It is not opposing the processing tax. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read a sentence or two:

I believe that the meat packers of this country are entitled to a profit on their operations, but it does not seem just and fair that they should enjoy the best years of their existence while the livestock producers are operating at a very great loss.

Mr. BEAM. Reserving the right to object, by whom is this statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. The statement was sent to me by Mr. N. K. Carnes, general manager of the Central Cooperative Association, a livestock association in St. Paul.

Mr. BEAM. He is the manager of an independent concern. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. DILL and Mr. COUZENS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the office of the Federal Radio Commission.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. HARRISON and Mr. REED members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the Treasury Department.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. DILL and Mr. COUZENS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the office of the United States Railroad Administration.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. MCKELLAR and Mr. SCHALL members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments", for the disposition of useless papers in the Post Office Department.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 2125. An act to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes.

WILD LIFE CONSERVATION

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, our wonderful President has given great impetus to the whole subject of wild-life conservation. He has put 250,000 of our young men into the forests. He has made available funds for the construction of new fish hatcheries. He has made available a million or more dollars to the Biological Survey for the improvement of wild-life refuges. He has made available $25,000,000 for subsistence homesteads to withdraw marginal lands from agricultural production, to be better used for fish, game, and forests, and in many other ways he has given impetus to this very important subject.

Last June I introduced in the House, House Resolution 173, to create a special committee of the House similar to that in the Senate, so that we might march shoulder to shoulder with the other branch of the Congress in this important work. On January 25 a special committee of the Senate on wild-life conservation will hold a public hearing in Washington, which will be attended by conservationists, by sportsmen, and by officials of game and fish departments throughout the entire United States. I hope very much that we shall have an opportunity for consideration of the resolution to create in the House a committee that can meet and cooperate with the Senate committee.

In that connection I find that a distinguished former member of the House, Hon. Harry B. Hawes, of Missouri, is today addressing the annual conference of the sportsmen of the New England States on this whole subject of wild-life conservation and the importance of a special committee in the House to present our views to the administration and to the people. The address contains so much of interest and so much valuable information that I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Harry B. Hawes at the Sixth Annual New England Game Conference, held under the auspices of the Massachusetts Fish and Game Association, Boston, Mass., January 13, 1934:

THE PRESENT STATUS OF NATIONAL CONSERVATION

Text of address by Hon. Harry B. Hawes

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I consider it a privilege to address this conference. These regional gatherings are attended by men who understand their local problems and who, by interchange of sectional opinion, form a national expression and become real practical aids to the Nation-wide conservation movement.

Later this month there will gather in New York, in the twentieth annual conference, men, from over all the United States and Canada, under the auspices of the American Game Association, followed by a Washington conference called by the Senate Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources, and then a conference with President Roosevelt on January 26.

But after all is said, it is the organized local expression which secures practical results.

Since I accepted your invitation last October to address this conference of New England sportsmen, there have been many and rapid changes in the conservation situation, and it has occurred to me that it would be interesting to discuss some of these developments in chronological order.

My expressions today are personal. I am not speaking as the representative of any particular group or organization.

Some years ago I spoke before the Beacon Society of your city. My subject on that occasion was Wild Life in the United States Senate and Wild Life Outside. Since then I have resigned from the United States Senate, so I am addressing you now as a private citizen.

1934 WITH HOPE

Conservationists enter the year 1934 with greater hope and better prospects than for many years past. This is because our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, is conservation minded. He has a broad grasp of the subject, which has interested him since his early manhood. While Governor of New York, his appointment of Henry Morgenthau, Jr., now Secretary of the Treasury, as conservation commissioner and William C. Adams as director of fish and game of New York revealed his ability and disposition to select men of the right character to administer conservation matters.

I wish the manifold duties, domestic and international, pressing upon the President for solution did not prevent him from giving to our subject the time I know he would like to devote to it.

Some years ago, while attending one of the annual American game conferences in New York, I had the pleasure of sitting next to Mr. Morgenthau, discussed fish and game problems with him, and found him enthusiastic and thorough; and I have since had the wish that his assignment in the national field might have been in the field of conservation.

It is a lamentable fact that both in and out of the Federal Government there are men at present dealing with this subject who do not understand it. Some take a sectional view, some do not seem to understand the limitation of Federal authority, and others have been swayed by the ultrasentimentalist.

I had hoped, and I still hope, that those in authority will call upon some of the officers, men of long experience, in associations like the Massachusetts Fish and Game Association; the American Game Association, which has been in existence for 22 years and the annual conferences of which form a clearing house for expression of opinion; the Izaak Walton League of America, an old and influential organization; the More Game Birds in America Foundation; the International Association of Game, Fish, and Conservation Commissioners; and various other organizations representing the fishermen and hunters of America, who are not merely recent converts but who for many years have spent their money and their time trying to make America conservation conscious, and whose devotion to the development of the big outdoors has with many of them been a life's work.

THE SENATE COMMITTEE

In the United States Senate we have the Special Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources, composed of seven Senators. They are Senators FREDERIC C. WALCOTT of Connecticut, KEY PITTMAN of Nevada, CHARLES L. MCNARY of Oregon, PETER NORBECK of South Dakota, BENNETT CHAMP CLARK of Missouri, JOSIAH W. BAILEY of North Carolina, and HARRY F. BYRD of Virginia.

For the last 4 years these Senators, with the assistance and detailed management of their able secretary, Carl D. Shoemaker, formerly head of the Game Commission of Oregon and an authority on this subject, have given generously of their time during the recesses of Congress in personal investigations and studies of this subject.

The committee has held long and extensive hearings on various related subjects.

One of these hearings concerned the consolidation of all Federal agencies under one Department of Conservation. The suggestion at that time was that there be created the office of Assistant or Under Secretary to the Secretary of Agriculture who should act as administrator and have the privilege of presenting the subject from time to time to the President and to his Cabinet.

These Senators have discussed the matter of sanctuaries, breeding grounds, and resting places along the flight lanes of waterfowl and have recommended restoration programs.

They have pointed out that we have only 24 national game protectors or enforcement officers, just one half a man to a State, a number too small to be effective, too limited to enforce the regulations which we now have.

The committee introduced a bill called the "coordination" bill, making compulsory cooperation in the matter of conservation by all departments of the Government. This bill passed the Senate in 1933, but it died in a last-minute jam in the House.

The committee discussed with great care and after elaborate hearings the matter of revenue to support Federal activities.

As regards revenues, it has opposed the severe cuts made in appropriations for the Department of Agriculture and the Biological Survey, which has alone suffered a total cut from more than $2,000,000 to less than $500,000 for next year, a reduction of 75 percent within the last 2 years, making it necessary to abolish some old-established functions of trained men in the Biological Survey. The committee has consistently asked for the appropriation of adequate sums authorized under the Norbeck-Andresen bill.

Finally, in order to procure a dependable yearly revenue of $1,000,000, this committee introduced what is known as the "duck stamp" bill.

They have covered the field very thoroughly. They have been on the job for 4 years, and effectively.

On the House side of the Capitol an effort is now being made by that earnest conservationist, Congressman A. WILLIS ROBERTSON, of Virginia, to create in his branch a special committee on conservation of wild-life resources similar to that in the Senate. I wish him success in this undertaking.

Associated with Mr. ROBERTSON are many—in fact, too many to name—Congressmen who have, like the Senators mentioned, devoted great portions of their spare time to conservation interests.

I can mention but two. One is RICHARD M. KLEBERG, of Texas, one of the directors of the great King's Ranch, possibly the greatest private game preserve in the world, who has introduced the "duck stamp" bill in the House; and MARVIN JONES, another Texan, Chairman of the Agricultural Committee of the House, who receives the full support of sportsmen in his district and understands the subject.

There are many others, but they cannot stand out in a group as does the Senate because they have not yet created a special committee on wild-life resources.

Returning to the Senate committee, we find that its chairman, FRED WALCOTT, of Connecticut, is not a theoretical conservationist; he is a practical sportsman, a fine shot, and good with the rod. He belongs to practically all the great game and fish organizations, and is experienced and able.

Senator PITTMAN, fine shot, understands his subject. He spent many years in Alaska, where he organized the informal civil government during its trying experiences. He knows the big outdoors, the forests, and the streams.

There is CHARLES MCNARY, who has studied the Alaskan situation. He is the author of many bills relating to reforestation, and is both enthusiastic and understanding.

Senator PETER NORBECK, whose name is associated with the Norbeck-Andresen bill, is a pioneer in this work. One of the reasons why he cannot be defeated in his State is that he has the support of the sportsmen and the fishermen there.

Senator JOSIAH W. BAILEY is a practical outdoor man from the State of North Carolina, where they probably have more ducks and geese than in any other State in the Union. I listened to him the other day on the radio. His address was not only an exposition; it was almost a prayer to play the game fairly like gentlemen in the hunting and fishing field and to do something practical.

There is BENNETT CHAMP CLARK, son of the old and beloved Speaker from the pioneer State of Missouri, which was the outpost in frontier days of the trails that led to Santa Fe and to Oregon. All these early traditions are associated with this pioneer spirit of plentiful game and plentiful sport. Finally there is Senator HARRY F. BYRD, former Governor of Virginia, known throughout the Nation, a practical conservationist and champion of wild-life restoration.

This is the type of man, upon whose abilities time will not permit me to enlarge, who recently waited on the President, accompanied by myself and the secretary of the committee, Mr. Shoemaker, and secured from him an opportunity to present a national program.

THE PRESIDENT

Usually it is considered bad form to repeat or release one's conversations with the President; but before leaving the recent conference, Senator WALCOTT inquired of Mr. Roosevelt whether he might give to the press the result of our interview, and the President told him to do so. Press dispatches of the hearing and its result were carried throughout the Nation.

Preceding this hearing and requesting that it be held, I presented to the President, on December 6, a written memorandum of matters that would be discussed, including the following:

1. The "duck stamp" bill.
2. Coordination and consolidation measures.
3. A request for appropriations under the Norbeck-Andresen Act.
4. The use of public works and unemployment funds in the matter of reforestation, pollution of streams, and related subjects of unemployment; increased acreage for wild life; and Government appropriations to be applied to conservation purposes. Part of my statement follows:

"The Government is asking for a limitation of farm acreage, which means idle land. Why can this not be utilized for game as a by-product of the farm? Land can now be purchased at the lowest price in many years, especially marsh land.

"We are planting trees and cutting out useless growths. Why cannot consideration be given to game and fish in this connection?

"The unemployed could be used to great advantage, in a healthy occupation, without additional cost.

"The great flood-control spillways on the lower reaches of the Mississippi River can be used for sanctuaries and breeding places, instead of remaining idle. Many of the former marsh areas could be restored economically through the C.C.C. or the C.P.A., or other recovery agencies, by constructing "pick and shovel" dikes and dams. A direct benefit would thus be given to the surrounding land through subirrigation, and immediate employment would be given many of our idle people."

The conference with the President was finally held on December 20, and in the conference, as the press dispatches of that date relate, the President, responding to the request for a conference on the 25th of January, following the American Game Conference, agreed he would on the 26th of January grant an audience to a committee of this conference which would outline a national conservation plan.

So the engagement was made for both the conference on January 25 and the reception of a committee representative in character from the different organizations and different sections of our country on the 26th to present to the President a detailed plan for future national conservation effort.

At the hearing on December 20 the President also agreed:

1. To endorse the "duck stamp" bill, which had already been approved by the Department of Agriculture.

2. To set aside $1,000,000 from the Public Works fund to be applied to the purchase of refuge areas for migratory waterfowl, with the condition that each project undertaken would call for the temporary employment of one unit of 200 men of the C.C.C.

3. To give sympathetic consideration and assistance, if possible, to appropriations under the Norbeck-Andresen Act.

THREE CABINET OFFICERS, TWO SENATORS, AND TWO CONGRESSMEN COMPOSE A COMMITTEE

The committee of Senators exhibited to the President a map showing the work of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission, composed of the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of the Interior, Cabinet officers, and two United States Senators, Senator KEY PITTMAN, Democratic member of the wild-life committee of the Senate, and Senator PETER NORBECK, Republican member of the same committee; and in the House of Representatives SAM D. MCREYNOLDS, Democratic chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and ROY O. WOODRUFF, an old friend of conservation, Republican member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House.

A vast amount of work has been done by this Commission.

It takes time to buy land. It cannot be done overnight. Titles have to be investigated, estate controversies settled, and many irritating processes gone over before the lands can be acquired. This work has already been done so far as sanctuaries, resting places, and breeding grounds are concerned.

The Commission has now ready for purchase 141 different areas. Legal conditions regarding the purchase of these areas have been studied, their geographical importance noted, and the prices ascertained. They include in the aggregate approximately 4,000,000 acres. It would be a duplication of effort, a loss of experience, to delegate this work, which is practically complete, to any other agency or committee.

The only unsolved part of the program was the absence of money with which to buy. The money for this purpose can come from only two sources: One from congressional appropriation, the other from Presidential order.

The recent Presidential order would seem to offer a fine opportunity to complete these purchases out of the $25,000,000 set aside for the purchase of marginal farm lands.

I was a member of this Migratory Bird Conservation Commission and can state that it has been painstaking and careful and has considered geography and location with great care, so that any machinery of purchase would of necessity have to rely upon the accumulated material of this Commission, just as it would have to rely also upon the investigations, experience, and conclusions of the Senate Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources.

It might be well to state the legal authority of this Commission. In the Migratory Bird Conservation Act, approved February 18, 1929, we find the following sections:

"SEC. 715-a. A commission, to be known as the "Migratory Bird Conservation Commission", consisting of the Secretary of Agriculture as chairman, the Secretary of Commerce, the Secretary of the Interior, and two Members of the Senate to be selected by the President of the Senate, and two Members of the House of Representatives to be selected by the Speaker, is hereby created and authorized to consider and pass upon any area of land, water, or land and water that may be recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture for purchase or rental under this chapter, and to fix the price or prices at which such area may be purchased or rented, and no purchase or rental shall be made of any such area until it has been approved for purchase or rental by said commission.

"SEC. 715-d. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to purchase or rent such areas as have been approved for purchase or rental by the Commission at the price or prices fixed by said Commission. * * *"

This is clear enough. It means that this Commission, composed of the members already named, is authorized to approve or disapprove all designations, rentals, or purchases of lands, and provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may not designate, rent, or purchase such lands without first having received the approval of this Commission. So it at once becomes apparent that the Commission should be a permanent part of any broad plan for conservation.

While this does not refer to purchases under the plan to spend $25,000,000 to buy marginal farm lands, it by implication does apply to, and certainly contains the only authority for, the purchase of migratory waterfowl areas.

$25,000,000 FOR MARGINAL LAND

"Resolved, That $25,000,000 be allocated to the Surplus Relief Corporation for the purpose of acquiring for the public domain certain submarginal lands and removing the same from commercial-agricultural production, and that the details be worked out by the Departments of Agriculture and Interior in connection with other agencies."

It may be assumed with some certainty that these purchases will be made in large tracts of not less than 1,000 acres, but to be effective they should embrace 5,000 acres or more.

It cannot be expected that the Government in these purchases shall buy outright a portion of each farm in the curtailment of production of agricultural products.

The problem, then, will be in what States and in what localities shall these purchases be made, and, to affect the farm problem, this distribution of purchases and restoration of public lands should be on some basis of population, acreage, and crop production, giving due consideration to the vast submarginal areas located in the States where waterfowl breed.

All the northwestern region and all the lands west of the Mississippi River were at one time Government lands; they were open to homesteaders or for purchase. The President's plan evidently contemplates the withdrawal by purchase of some of these lands which formerly belonged to the Government, thus vastly enlarging our public domain.

Very naturally, this extensive addition to our present reservations, parks, and Government areas offers an inviting field for wild-life conservation, as it does also for any plan of reforestation. There is no reason why lands withdrawn from private use should not be put to conservation uses. There is no reason why, when water is restored to marsh areas, these cannot be utilized for such purposes and for fish replacement.

The President's attention was called to the use of the public domain for conservation purposes in the course of our interview on December 20.

A GENERAL PLAN JANUARY 26

Widespread interest was aroused by the President on this subject in that conference and it was followed by his order of January 2 for the purchase of acreage to be added to present areas of public lands.

On January 3, 2 weeks after our conference with the President, at which, as I have said, it was agreed that a national plan would be presented to him on January 26, Secretary Wallace appointed a committee of three to discuss a special plan that had been suggested. The committee are the very able chairman of the Conservation Commission of Connecticut, Mr. Thomas H. Beck, Mr. J. N. Darling, a distinguished cartoonist from Iowa, and Mr. Aldo Leopold, a recognized authority in matters of conservation and author of valuable books on the subject.

Accordingly, we find conservation on the way, with the Senate committee outlining the general plan to the President on December 20, to be presented on January 26, and a special committee to discuss a special plan in the interim.

PRESIDENT NEARLY KILLED BY A GOOSE

During the conference on December 20, reference was made to some wild ducks that were sent to the President by Senator Pittman. I jocularly remarked that I would raise the Senator's "ante" and send him some wild geese.

Besides his business acumen and understanding of governmental functions, our President possesses a keen sense of humor.

When I referred to sending him the geese, he said: "Gentlemen, do you know—and it is hard for you to believe—that I was nearly killed by a goose?" He explained that while he was seated in a blind, a flock of geese was passing overhead and he fired directly at them and whirled to have a second shot at some stragglers that were coming from the left. Just as the second shot was fired, he was struck on the shoulder and neck by the first goose he had hit and which had dropped from on high. It knocked him back into the blind. A goose weighs 12 to 14 pounds, as you all know. Six inches more and it would have hit him on the head. If it had, we might not now have our great President.

So in tracing his history, we find him in his early days in a duck blind, or following the dogs after quail, and still later, as Governor of his State, selecting the best men for conservation development, and now, as President of the United States, preparing to receive a plan of Nation-wide significance from a committee of seven distinguished Senators, supplemented by representatives of all the great game organizations and editors of the game and fish magazines of America.

This is cheering. That is the reason I give it in detail so that you may watch the developments with hope and encouragement.

The law has created leadership in this conservation movement and given it to the President, and Secretary Wallace, Secretary Ickes, and Secretary Roper, 2 United States Senators, and 2 Congressmen, all members of the Migratory Bird Conservation Commission.

To these now may be added a new figure of striking personality, Harry Hopkins, Civil Works and Relief Administrator, who carries a fine "wallop" and a splendid "punch", and we are glad to have this new figure in the conservation movement.

FEDERAL AND STATE AUTHORITY

In discussing this problem, it is well that State and Federal authority should be defined, because if we attempt an extension of Federal control over State control it will bring opposition, and if it is decided to adopt a new plan embodying a radical departure from the past, this will require legislative enactment in 48 States, and in some cases State constitutional amendments, thus delaying the solution of the problem for many years, meantime leaving it unsettled and uncertain.

In a general way it may be said that, following and adopting the common law of England, the courts have held that our States own all the wild game and fish not restrained or physically possessed. The title of the several States is subject to the power of their legislatures to impose restrictions and regulations looking to the preservation of such game and fish for public use. The States may, by statute, regulate the private use of fish or game upon private property, as well as its disposal by the owner of the property. The right of private ownership is not a vested right, but a grant, subordinate to State control.

States control fresh-water fish and shore-line rights on navigable streams and inland lakes and on salt-water shore lines. In a broad, general way, game and fish belong to the States and are controlled and regulated by their legislatures, which have delegated to fish and game commissioners the administration thereof.

State sovereignty in this matter gives way only to the operation of the Migratory Bird Treaty with Canada, which is administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, acting for the Federal Government.

Prior to this treaty, the courts refused to sustain Federal acts seeking to regulate migratory birds.

The Federal Government has no control over either upland game birds or animals except when these are found on Federal property.

Naturally, if the program of purchasing submarginal land is carried through, it will increase the acreage in public lands. On these newly acquired lands the Government can greatly extend its conservation activities as they relate to all varieties of game.

But the work need not stop here. It may be extended to include upland game birds and wild animals of all species; and, where practical, fish hatcheries may be constructed and fish culture undertaken.

This vast increase in acreage makes it possible to propagate various species of birds where the land or water areas are suitable for their distribution to States by the official conservation agencies of each State, but Federal control and direction as regards upland game birds and animals will not extend beyond the territory actually owned or controlled by the Federal Government.

There has always been reposed in the Bureau of Biological Survey the power to investigate scientifically different species of game, and to submit the result of these investigations to the commissions of States and those interested in game problems.

With adequate funds this service can be largely extended. There are trained men in the Government who are prepared to furnish this service, but they cannot do it without the necessary money to print and distribute the information.

We find, therefore, an exact limitation on Federal authority:

First. It is confined to lands actually owned or rented by the Government.

Second. It is restricted to disseminating general information, as in other fields of agriculture and industry, to State agencies. Beyond this it cannot go.

In some States where there is a large acreage of Federal lands the State laws control the hunting and fishing privileges on this national property. It is done not under Federal, but State regulation, and this regulation will not be easily or willingly transferred.

One practical function of the Federal Government is that of gathering and disseminating useful information in regard to game crops, their management, predators, and allied subjects. These studies of the Biological Survey, being national in character, are very helpful to State commissions, which in their studies are necessarily confined to their own States and their immediate problems. The national review of the Biological Survey is therefore very helpful, in fact necessary.

Furnishing information of the sort I have indicated is not a unique service, nor is it confined exclusively to the Biological Survey. Every other Federal department does a similar thing.

Many other subjects relating to mining, manufacturing, industry, and farming are studied and made the subjects of reports by national agencies; but, except in time of national emergency, actual control of these activities has always been retained by the States.

For example, there are issued each year regulations relating to migratory waterfowl prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture and promulgated by our President.

One of the unsolved problems is that of enforcing these waterfowl regulations. They cannot be properly enforced with but 24 game wardens. Recently, in a conference with the President, it was suggested that the work of enforcement might be entrusted in part to the Department of Justice and carried out through its marshals and other enforcement agencies. This suggestion is well worth very careful consideration.

Nothing new is offered in the way of a national program. Every great game organization for years has had a program of comprehensive scope. All the great magazines in the field have discussed this problem, and there is no novelty in any of these proposals, except as respects the suggestion for a very considerable enlargement of Federal activities through the purchase of farm lands with the $25,000,000 allotted for that purpose.

SOME FUNDAMENTALS OF GAME CONTROL

Any program must in one way or another involve the following fundamentals:

1. Utilization for conservation purposes of all publicly owned Federal property, both land and water, including military reservations.

2. Better enforcement of Federal regulations by an increase in the number of Federal enforcement officers. There are only 24—one half of a man to a State. These wardens are not physically capable of enforcing the present regulations issued by the Secretary of Agriculture. Additional personnel must be provided. Until we have the funds with which to enforce the regulations now in existence, further regulations should not be made without very careful thought.

3. The coordination of all national agencies having to do with conservation.

4. The continuous personal attention of the Secretary of Agriculture is desirable. Our present Secretary is an able man, energetic, and a hard worker, but it is not physically possible for him to give to the subject of conservation the time and supervision its importance justifies.

There should be some responsible head reporting directly to the President or to the President's Cabinet as a whole, or to the Secretary of Agriculture individually. In one of the hearings held by the Senate Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources it was proposed that there should be an office of conservation under the Department of Agriculture, to be filled by a man with administrative capacity and responsible for the execution of the Federal program.

All our domestic fowl and edible and service animals are the progeny of wild birds and animals. They have all of them been domesticated by man. We certainly should find the intelligence to restore wild species by propagation and replacement.

In the last 25 years experimentation by private individuals, clubs, and foundations has been successful, but this must all be supplemented by National and State experimentation. The primary problems have largely been solved, but the solutions have not been understood by the farmer and the landowner.

GAME A PROFITABLE CROP

It can be easily demonstrated that game can be a profitable farm crop, and now at a time when we are withdrawing millions of acres of land from cultivation much acreage on all farms could be devoted to game production.

Many excellent books and treatises have been written to describe methods and give plans. Three of the latest are one by Aldo Leopold on Game Management; another, Game Preserve Shooting, by Lawrence B. Smith; and the third Herbert Stoddard's book on quail. All should be in sportsmen's libraries and in the reference libraries of the various State game commissions.

Game located on State property or on private farms helps to stock the whole State in these restricted areas because the stock spreads to the adjacent lands.

Wild ducks are easy to raise. Every duck club and farmer who uses live decoys knows how easy it is to raise certain species, so easy, in fact, that they become domesticated too quickly.

My statement a moment ago that game can be made a profitable crop to the farmer has been demonstrated conclusively in certain sections of our country and throughout Europe. It can be made to pay in various ways in the sale of hunting privileges or otherwise when raised on private preserves.

The disposal of game, however, has heretofore been considered a subject for State legislatures, so that the local sentiment of the State would control. It is not a national problem, so it should not be introduced nationally, but left to the States for decision. Our people have their own local customs and characteristics and their problems of climate, soil, and habitability of both fish and game.

But whether State control is desirable is not the question. The fact is that the authority to regulate these matters rests with the States and cannot be delegated to the Federal Government without one of two processes.

The first would be by Federal constitutional amendment giving to the Federal Government control over all forms of game; or, second, by securing acquiescence from the 48 State legislatures and the Governors of each of these States.

My subject has been confined to national legislation, which involves the enactment of one Federal law or a series of Federal laws and the regulations under the migratory-bird treaty with Canada. The Federal problem is much simpler, therefore, than the State problem, easier to handle, and can largely be solved within a few years.

It will be many years before the divers problems of the States can be clarified, but effective Federal regulation sets a precedent and will have a stimulating effect upon the legislatures of all the States.

DATES IN RECENT PROGRESS

Briefly summarizing chronologically, this subject was discussed by me before the Izaak Walton League convention on the 27th of April 1933, shortly after the inauguration of President Roosevelt. I stated at that time: "Legislation in Washington at the present time is going through a unique crisis approximated only by that of war time. * * * In such an emergency the granting of extraordinary powers to the President has been approved first by the Congress and now by the whole Nation. The outcome of this granting of power is necessarily dependent upon the genius and understanding of those who will be selected by the President to administer his program under it. * * * If the men selected by him as administrators have conservation in mind, have been students of the subject, and have had experience, then our conservation movement will be as successful as other industries in our national life."

In May 1933 Mr. Seth Gordon, president of the American Game Association, accompanied by the heads of the National Grange, the American Farm Bureau Federation, and the National Farmers' Union, called upon Secretary Wallace to urge upon him the wisdom of planning an intensive game and fish restoration program as part of the administration's plan to eliminate millions of acres from agricultural production. The Secretary, according to Mr. Gordon, assured the delegation of his interest in the plan, but urged that action be deferred until other pressing matters were disposed of, when he would again consider the proposition further.

And then again, on the 21st of September of the same year, before the International Association of Game, Fish, and Conservation Commissioners, the subject of national conservation was reviewed by me.

I have already referred to my communication to the President on December 6, arranging for the conference with the President by the entire Senate committee on December 20, to the President's order of January 2 for the purchase of $25,000,000 of land, and to the appointment of a committee of three to consider one special plan on January 3.

All the great game organizations have in the interim met and passed resolutions, devoting days of study to the question, and put these resolutions on record, and I assume they have been forwarded to the Secretary of Agriculture, so that there is already collected and assembled a vast amount of material ready for assimilation and to be put into practical operation.

It can well be understood how some conservationists have become disturbed, restless, and dissatisfied because conservation has not been more in the public picture. Considering uncertain conditions, it may be said that efforts have been made from the beginning of this administration to make more definite and to enlarge the conservation program. International and national conditions have been such, however, that until recently progress has been slow.

HUNTERS AND FISHERMEN ARE THE PRACTICAL FRIENDS

The sinew and the strength of conservation come from the hunters and fishermen. Thirteen million of them—20 percent of our adult population—pay annually $12,000,000 for the protection, replacement, and management of game birds, animals, and fish.

Our annual outdoor bill is estimated to be $650,000,000.

I have contended for years that the best friends of real conservation of both fish and game are those who engage in these sports, or, stated in another way, "game's best friend is the hunter, and the best friend of the fish is the fisherman."

Sentimentalists may place the whole practical conservation program in actual danger by demanding extreme and unenforceable regulations. Will there not be overregulation in the matter of conservation as there was in the case of prohibition? Will it not drive out the licensed, ethical sportsmen and leave their places to be taken by game and fish hogs and game bootleggers?

Strange as it may seem, the biggest game crop in America is the humble and lowly rabbit, the cottontail. There are more rabbits killed each year than ducks, quail, grouse, or pheasants. These rabbits belong to the State. The Federal Government would have quite a job controlling them. There are probably more shells exploded on rabbits than on any other game crop. Bre'r Rabbit does not belong to Uncle Sam, he belongs to the States.

If we let the sentimentalists have their way and there is overregulation followed by bootlegging and outlawry, some of the regulations may be repealed, but in the meantime the damage will have been done.

Everyone agrees that commercial slaughter should be stopped. It is reported that both commercial and night shooting are increasing, and that game outlaws have no respect for the closed season in the fall and spring; this because our present regulations are not enforced. It is agreed that there should be proper regulations, proper bag limits, proper seasonal limits, proper restoration efforts. But extremes in these will in the last analysis and in the long run produce lawlessness in game control, the very thing these ultrasentimentalists do not want.

SKEET A FRIEND

Mr. William Foster, the well-known outdoor editor of your city, has the distinction of having introduced into America the sport of shooting skeet. What was the fundamental thought back of skeet? It was to improve marksmanship, alertness of the eye, and the coordination necessary for successful field shooting. It encouraged men to use guns designed for all kinds of game. Guns of all types and all kinds of loads were permitted. Withdraw game from the skeet shooters and half of the enjoyment of this sport will be destroyed. The old trap shooter, with his single-barrel gun and a standard load, shot at clay pigeons going in one direction. That is sport, but it did not make of him a better hunter.

We are all grateful to our friend Foster for having introduced this diversion. After all, sportsmen know that a proper bag limit properly enforced is the answer to the sentimentalist, supplemented by feeding and protection on resting and breeding grounds.

Henry McGuire has developed a somewhat similar game for small-bore rifle shooters.

Ray Holland, Paul Whipple, and other outdoor writers are constantly endeavoring to stimulate the interest of fishermen and hunters by suggestions and advice.

HELP FROM EACH INDIVIDUAL

Real practical conservationists may rely with some certainty upon the presentation of a broad national plan to the President on January 26, by a delegation composed of representatives of all our great game organizations and outdoor editors, with consideration given to geographical location.

We have the President's sympathetic understanding. With the benefit of his usual vigorous leadership, Federal conservation will not only be on the way, it will have arrived.

Most sportsmen, hunters, and fishermen have remained silent under the impression that their cause was understood, that it did not require explanation from them; but recently it has been demonstrated that this is not the case.

May I appeal to you for some individual action; that is, a personal participation in the great movement? Congressmen and Senators like to hear directly from their constituents in the matter of legislation when the communications are informative and helpful. May I be permitted to suggest that each of you send a letter to your Congressman, to your Senator, to the Secretary of Agriculture, or even to the President of the United States, pointing out the situation and asking for national assistance. This would be very helpful.

Each man here probably pays a hunting license, or a fishing license, and in some cases, both. You pay your dues to your sportsmen's organizations. You have paid your traveling expenses to this meeting. The investment of half an hour's time and some few cents in postage will prove a mighty force to secure necessary legislation.

It is all very well to listen to speeches and to read pamphlets, but the time has come when the 13,000,000 fishermen and hunters should be heard in a vigorous way; and I believe, so far as the President and some of his advisers are concerned, you will receive not only sympathetic consideration but will bring about practical achievements. If each one of us does his best, the combined effort will be irresistible.

Thanks for your attention and consideration.

THE "DUCK STAMP BILL" (H.R. 5632; S. 1658)

The "duck stamp" bill was prepared by a committee of experts for the Senate Committee on Conservation of Wild Life Resources. The phraseology was prepared by the Legislative Drafting Counsel of the United States Senate.

It was then submitted to the responsible heads of all national game organizations and to editors of out door magazines for suggestions and amendments.

Practical suggestions have been adopted.

It is approved by the President of the United States of America, the Secretary of Agriculture, the American Game Association, the Izaak Walton League of America, More Game Birds in America, a foundation, the International Association of Game and Fish Conservation Commissioners, all out door magazines, and all local duck clubs.

No organized opposition has developed from any source; the approval seems unanimous and enthusiastic.

PROVISIONS AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS

1. The purchase by wild-fowl hunters of a stamp costing $1—

(a) To be purchased at a convenient post office.

(b) To be pasted on the State license.

(c) To produce an annual revenue estimated to exceed one million.

(d) The revenues so raised to be expended for better protection.

(e) For the purchase of resting, sanctuary, and breeding places.

(f) With no expense to the Government, the entire cost of waterfowl restoration placed upon the wild fowler.

(g) And it costs less than 1 box of shells.

PAYMENT OF MILEAGE

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 228, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Joint Resolution 228

To provide for certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress

Resolved, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of certain expenses incident to the second session of the Seventy-third Congress, namely:

SENATE

For mileage of Senators, $38,250.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

For mileage of Representatives, the Delegate from Hawaii, and the Resident Commissioner from Puerto Rico, and for expenses of the Delegate from Alaska and the Resident Commissioners from the Philippine Islands, $131,250.

For stationery for Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, including $4,400 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $44,000, to be available for expenditure notwithstanding the provisions of section 304 of the act of June 30, 1932 (47 Stat. 408), as continued and made applicable to the fiscal year 1934 by section 4 (a), title II, of the act of March 20, 1933 (48 Stat. 13): Provided, That from such sum each Representative, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner shall be allowed $90 for stationery allowance or commutation therefor.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. My understanding is that this is a resolution to provide the funds to pay the mileage of Members and to provide funds for stationery allowances notwithstanding the provisions of the Economy Act of last year, the Members as a rule having exhausted all their funds during the special session last spring.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Part of their funds, not all of them.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Those reservations simply had reference to the Economy Act that was passed?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Is this the usual procedure, or does it come in under an appropriation bill?

Mr. BUCHANAN. This is the usual procedure.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FINNISH PEOPLE A GREAT AND HONEST PEOPLE—CULTURE AND INTEGRITY OUTSTANDING

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the question of the payment of debts owing this country and include therein a letter written by our former colleague, Mr. Larsen, of Duluth, to the Baltimore Sun.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter written by a former Member of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this article confined to the letter or is it a newspaper article?

Mr. KNUTSON. No; this is a letter. There is no comment upon it by the paper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, when President Roosevelt, in his message to Congress, announced that Finland is the only debtor nation to discharge its obligations to this country promptly, and without quibbling or evasion, his remarks were greeted with a salvo of applause that was truly gratifying to all who have watched the progress of that truly wonderful people, before and since attaining their independence.

Unfortunately, Finland and the Finnish people are not so well known here in America as could be wished, but let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the Finnish people have a culture superior to that possessed by many better-known nations, and their contribution to the development of the great Northwest is of a most noteworthy character. In the sciences, in industry and business, in agriculture they have attained a position second to none.

Many of the older Members of this House recall with pleasure the service in this body of Hon. Oscar J. Larson, who for several terms represented the Eighth District of Minnesota. Mr. Larson is a native-born Finn. He is a scholar and a gentleman of the highest standing. His service to the cause of international peace and good will has been of such a high order that he has been decorated by several European governments. On July 3, last, Mr. Larson addressed a remarkable communication to the Baltimore Sun on Finland and the Finnish people. I say remarkable because of its completeness, conciseness, and brevity, and it is for the purpose of making this noteworthy document a part of the permanent record that I have requested its insertion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time. I am sure it will be read by every admirer and student of Finland with pleasure and profit. The letter follows:

To the Editor of the Sun—Sir: "There has been a regular outburst of thanks, compliments, and congratulations to Finland ever since that little country distinguished itself by paying its war-debt installment in full last month."

Such is the introductory sentence to an article in the current issue of the Literary Digest, which article consists largely of excerpts from several editorials complimenting and congratulating Finland. The article contains also a cartoon taken from the Sun. Finland is depicted therein as a man with an ugly physiognomy and arrayed in the garb of a rude, semicivilized Laplander. Underneath the cartoon are the words, "A Finn, Indeed."

I assume that it was not the intention of the cartoonist to draw a picture of a typical Finn. The picture was no doubt intended to be merely a caricature. If Finland were a well-known country, there would be no occasion for grievance, nor, indeed, for this letter. But, unfortunately, Finland is not well known here in America. It probably would be no exaggeration to say that the popular notion of Finland is that it is a land perennially covered with snow and ice located in the Arctic regions and inhabited with a backward people. The cartoon with the words, "A Finn, Indeed", published underneath confirms that popular notion which is altogether erroneous.

Finland is not a backward country. On the contrary, as all foreign students who have made a thorough study of Finland testify, it is one of the most enlightened and progressive countries in the world. Alfred J. Pearson, dean of the College of Liberal Arts, Drake University, and former Minister of the United States to Finland, in his recent book, the Land of a Thousand Lakes, says therein:

"They are great readers. One of the pleasant surprises for the tourist is to find that the largest bookstore in the world, with the exception of Foyle's, in London, is located in Helsingfors. Practically everybody can read and does read. The illiteracy in Finland is less than one tenth of 1 percent.

"The psychologist will find the Finns an interesting study. They are slow to warm up, but when you have won their friendship they stick. Their honesty is proverbial. For this reason it is an especial pleasure to deal with them in matters of business, for once having agreed to the terms of a contract, whether written or oral—both are equally sacred to them—they will go through with it, even if it means a loss to them."

Cecil Gray, an Englishman, in his work on Sibelius, published recently by the Oxford University Press, makes the following appraisal of Finland and the Finns:

"Statistics show that as far back as 1900 no more than 1.2 percent of the population was illiterate—a record of which no other country in the world could boast at that time—and since then this minute percentage has dwindled into nothing.

"The general level of education, moreover, is unusually high, and the ratio of widely cultured individuals to the community is probably greater in Finland than anywhere else at the present day.

"Her political constitution is the last word in enlightened democracy.

"Finland is one of the most—if not, indeed, as is very probable, quite the most advanced and progressive country in Europe today.

"Helsingfors (Helsinki) is one of the most modern and up-to-date cities in Europe, in comparison with which London and Paris seem—and are—in many respects backward and old-fashioned."

Just the other day the University of Michigan conferred an honorary degree upon Eliel Saarinen, a world-renowned Finnish architect, now a resident of the United States, in recognition of the contribution of his genius to the recent achievement in American architecture.

Every music lover in America has been edified and inspired by the soul-stirring symphonies and symphonic poems of Finland's great composer, Jean Sibelius, probably the greatest composer since Beethoven.

A backward country could not produce such masters in the fine arts as Saarinen and Sibelius are acknowledged to be in every civilized country.

Neither does a backward country produce an expert in public finance such as the present governor of the Bank of Finland, of whom a regular correspondent of the Chicago Daily Tribune stated that he was the only public financier he had found in all Europe who apparently had a clear conception of the European financial muddle and a definite policy for the way out.

This same correspondent stated that he found that the standard of living in Finland was nearer to that of the United States than was the standard of living in any other European country, and that the people that walked along the Esplanade—a boulevard running through part of the center of Helsingfors—were groomed as well as the people that walk along Michigan Avenue in Chicago.

I have referred to the ugly physiognomy of the Finn depicted in the cartoon. Pulchritude may not be so important, but even in pulchritude Finland is not a backward country, for the other day a young maiden of Finnish parentage in a beauty contest was awarded a prize of $5,000 and was enthroned as the queen of the Chicago World's Fair.

Because of the prevailing popular notion in the United States of little Finland, I trust you will publish this letter in the Sun for the information of its readers.

O. J. LARSON.

DULUTH, MINN., July 3, 1933.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, during the sessions of the Seventy-second Congress and the extraordinary session of the Seventy-third Congress we heard so much from the floor of this House of the terrible economic conditions that existed throughout the country and the stories of wide-spread economic disaster and despair from every State in the Union that I feel like giving to the House a little bit of cheer. Under the new administration business has picked up to such an extent in Kentucky and the hopes and ambitions of the people are so gratifying that the blue grass has already come up through the ground to welcome the good news and the flowers are bursting the ground trying to get through to welcome the better day.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman give the Almighty any credit at all?

Mr. MAY. The Lord always loved Kentucky. The Kentucky General Assembly, in recognition of a better day, has passed a joint resolution, which I desire to include as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution follows:

Whereas our national life has entered upon a period of marked and rapid economic and social changes; and

Whereas the stern realities of a major depression have forced a far-reaching adjustment in business and governmental practice; and

Whereas, as of March 4, 1933, we were in a time of keen distress, wide-spread misgivings, and unrest; and

Wheras within the period of a few months a great national administration has, with bold, original, and ingenious strokes, laid aside the strife of parties, the antagonism of personalities, the bitterness of particular controversies, and restored the confidence and hope of the people, fed the starving, given work to millions of unemployed, revived a chaotic banking and currency system, abolished the sweatshops, taken child life away from machines, saved the homes of the farmers and urban dwellers, and made a lasting contribution to the peace of the world: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved:

SECTION 1. That the house of representatives (the senate concurring) commend, approve, and uphold the governmental policies of our great President, Franklin Delano Roosevelt, and pledge to him that Kentucky will do its full share in support of the national administration, its policies and practices;

We further commend the course of the Members of the United States Senate from Kentucky and the Members of the House of Representatives in their support of the national administration and request them to continue to support the policies of the President; be it further resolved

SEC. 2. That a copy of this resolution, signed by the speaker of the house and president of the senate, attested by the clerk of each, be mailed to the President of the United States, the Members of the Senate from the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and the Members of the House from the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

BYRON H. ROYSTER,
Chief Clerk Senate.
J. E. SANDERS,
Clerk of the House.

ELECTRIFYING AMERICA—MUSCLE SHOALS DEVELOPMENT—CHEAP ELECTRIC LIGHTS AND POWER IN EVERY HOME AND ON EVERY FARM

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, on January 13 our colleague, Hon. JOHN E. RANKIN, delivered a radio address on the subject of Muscle Shoals development. I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I first wish to express my thanks to the National Broadcasting Co. and associated radio stations for giving me this opportunity to address you on that phase of the "new deal" relating to the production and distribution of electric power at Muscle Shoals.

The power question is undoubtedly one of the greatest issues with which the American people will have to deal during the coming years.

When Thomas A. Edison, a little more than half a century ago, generated a spark of electricity into a small wire encased in a vacuum tube, and created the first electric light, he did more to revolutionize the industrial, the economic, the commercial, the domestic, and the social life of mankind than has any other human being who ever lived in all the ages of recorded time. He made possible this electric age.

Edison dreamed of an electrified America. As a result of the Muscle Shoals bill, passed at the last session of Congress, and now being put into effect by the Tennessee Valley Authority, that dream is beginning to come true.

There are two schools of thought with reference to the hydroelectric power in our navigable streams. One believes that it is private property and should be monopolized by private interests for private gain. The other believes it is public property, national wealth, and should be used for the benefit of all the American people. I belong to the latter school. Senator NORRIS, of Nebraska, belongs to that school. President Roosevelt belongs to that school. The present members of the Tennessee Valley Authority belong to that school. That is the idea upon which the law creating the Tennessee Valley Authority is based.

As soon as that bill became a law President Roosevelt appointed as members of the Tennessee Valley Authority, three of the ablest men to be found in the whole country—Dr. Arthur E. Morgan, the chairman; Hon. David E. Lilienthal, general counsel; and Dr. Harcourt A. Morgan, in charge of the agricultural development. They have developed the Tennessee Valley Authority into one of the most efficient organizations connected with this Government and have filled their key positions with men of ability, character, and loyalty to the great cause they represent. They are blazing the way for an electrified America.

That law provides that the Tennessee Valley Authority may build power lines for the transmission of this power to the ultimate consumers, including people in the rural districts. That is the provision of the Norris-Rankin bill which provoked such a heated controversy in the last session of Congress and which is now being put into effect.

Carrying out that provision of the law, the Tennessee Valley Authority recently signed a contract with the city of Tupelo, Miss., my home town, under the terms of which the Authority is to furnish us power for 20 years, beginning February 7, 1934.

The Tennessee Valley Authority also recently purchased the holdings of the power companies in limited areas in Tennessee, Alabama, and northeastern Mississippi. Under this latter contract, in addition to serving Tupelo, the Authority will be enabled to service Corinth, Iuka, Booneville, Baldwyn, Fulton, Amory, and all other points in the area covered by this contract, including the people in the rural districts, with cheap power from Muscle Shoals without delay.

In order that the benefits of this great development may be carried to the people themselves the Tennessee Valley Authority wrote into the contract the retail rates the ultimate consumers should pay. Where we had been paying a maximum of 10 cents a kilowatt-hour the residential rates to be charged the ultimate consumer under the Tupelo contract were reduced to 3 cents. Here are the Tupelo rates. Compare them with the rates you are now paying:

First 50 kilowatt-hours per month at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Next 150 kilowatt-hours per month at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Next 200 kilowatt-hours per month at 1 cent per kilowatt-hour.

Excess: Over 400 kilowatt-hours per month at 4 mills per kilowatt-hour.

The basic commercial rates to be charged the ultimate consumers in Tupelo under this contract are as follows:

First 250 kilowatt-hours per month at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Next 750 kilowatt-hours per month at 2 cents per kilowatt-hour.

Next 1,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 1 cent per kilowatt-hour.

Excess: Over 2,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 0.8 cent per month.

The basic industrial rates to be charged in Tupelo under this contract are as follows:

Demand charge: $1 per kilowatt-hour per month.

Demand: Maximum integrated 30-minute period.

Energy charge:

First 10,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 10 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Next 25,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 6 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Next 65,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 4 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Next 400,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 3 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Excess: Over 500,000 kilowatt-hours per month at 2.5 mills per kilowatt-hour.

Taken as a whole, these rates reduce the light-and-power bills to the ultimate consumers on an average of 68 percent.

The President has referred to this schedule of rates in the Tupelo contract as the "yardstick." It shows the American people what hydroelectric power really is worth. In working out this schedule the Tennessee Valley Authority was very careful to include every item of cost, even to the amortization of the cost of the dam itself. They are not selling us power below cost. The truth of the business is they have been so careful to work out a schedule under which the Government would not lose, that they have provided rates which will, in all probability, be reduced as the years go by.

But the spokesmen of the power interests contend that the Tennessee Valley Authority does not take into account all the operating costs faced by private operators. That is true; they do not have to take all of them into consideration.

For instance, they do not have take into consideration the dividends paid on watered stocks. They do not have to take into consideration the tribute to holding companies. They do not have to take into consideration the excessive executive salaries and expense accounts, such as were paid to Samuel Insull and others of more or less ill repute, lobbying expenses, tributes to power-controlled newspapers, magazines, etc.

The Tennessee Valley Authority is able to eliminate all these expenses, and many other similar items, from its rate schedule and can therefore serve the people with electric power at something like what it is worth.

What is being done in the Muscle Shoals area, can be done, and must be done, ultimately, in every other city, town, and community throughout the United States. This is a national policy and its benefits must be carried to all the American people.

But the greatest development yet undertaken by the Tennessee Valley Authority is that of rural electrification. I again call your attention to what is being done in northeastern Mississippi. The money allotted to the counties of Lee, Alcorn, Tishomingo, Prentiss, Itawamba, Monroe, and Pontotoc, by the Civil Works Administration, is being used to employ labor to build power lines throughout the rural districts. The same thing is being done in certain counties in Alabama and Tennessee. We expect to light every home in that section of the country, and to give the farmers electric lights and power at the same rates that are to be charged in the city under the Tupelo contract.

The following figures show the estimated monthly cost to farmers of the following items of electric service:

Item no.	Monthly bill	Service and appliance used
1	$0.75	Lights.
2	1.00	Lights and radio.
3	1.50	Lights, radio, and water pump.
4	2.00	Lights, radio, water pump, electric iron, and percolator.

This is the greatest move toward getting people back to the farm, keeping the ones on the farm who are there now, and making farm life pleasant, profitable, and attractive that was ever instituted by this or any other Government.

You can't drive people back to the farm. You can't browbeat young people into staying on the farm where they can't make a living, and where they have none of the comforts and conveniences of modern life. But, when you give them these conveniences, these appliances, and this power, to lift the burdens of drudgery from their shoulders, you make the farm so attractive that, instead of hurrying through school in order to get away from the farm, as the students in our rural districts are doing today, they will be hurrying through school to get back to the farm. It will stimulate their home pride, increase their love for home, inspire their patriotism, and encourage them in their efforts to accomplish something worth while and to make their homes better places in which to live. It will double the value of every farm home it serves.

If it did nothing else but relieve the farm women of this country of the untold drudgery they now bear, such as cleaning, washing, and scrubbing, it would still be the outstanding achievement of the century, to put this cheap power into every farm home in America.

But men will ask, "How are the farmers to purchase this equipment when they haven't the money with which to pay?" That has also been provided for. The Electric Home and Farm Authority was recently organized by order of President Roosevelt. It is capitalized at a million dollars and has a lending power of at least $10,000,000, and probably more. It has the same directors as the Tennessee Valley Authority. Its purpose is to advance credit to farmers and other homeowners in the Muscle Shoals area with which to buy electric equipment and appliances. Arrangements have been made to secure these equipments for the consumers of electric light and power at very low prices and to advance them credit on long terms and at low rates of interest.

As has been pointed out, the home or the farm of the family of modest income has never had the benefit of the general use of electricity. In the Muscle Shoals area, although there are vast sources of power available, the people have had to use it sparingly, if at all. Two barriers have prevented a full enjoyment of the benefits of this great national resource—prohibitive rates charged by the producers of electric energy, and the high cost of electric equipment and appliances charged by their manufacturers. The two have prevented a general use of electricity, to the detriment of themselves, as well as to the consumers. The Electric Home and Farm Authority plans to remove those barriers and to give to the people of that area an opportunity for the fullest use of electric light and power, at the very minimum of cost.

When we carry this program into every town and city and village, and to every farm throughout the country, we will have written the greatest chapter in the economic, industrial, and social development of America. We will have brought light to the homes and hope to the hearts of the now distressed farmers in every nook and corner of the United States. We will have given American civilization a new birth of hope and of inspiration. Our country may then justly and proudly claim her place as the leader among the civilized countries of the world, and may go on down to the future, as Henry Grady once said, holding high the torch and making light the way, "up which all the nations of the earth must come in God's appointed time."

RESOLUTION OF ENDORSEMENT

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks upon the financing agencies of the administration for the benefit of agriculture, and to include therein a brief resolution adopted at a mass meeting of the farmers in Lawrence County, S.C.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I respectfully call your attention to the attached resolution unanimously adopted by a mass meeting of 800 farmers at Laurens, S.C., on January 8, 1934. This resolution is interesting especially because of its unanimous endorsement of the policy of President Roosevelt in waging a successful warfare against the depression. These farmers pledge their support and cooperation to the President and to the Congress in their efforts to restore the country to normal prosperity.

Whereas our Senators and Congressman have for a number of years advocated that a fair and equitable price be paid to the producer for his product, thereby giving a living wage to the man who tills the soil, and to the man who works in industrial plants; and

Whereas they have been instrumental in securing appropriations from the Government for the purpose of making loans to the farmers with which to finance the making and gathering of their crops, a bill now pending to the effect that this be done, which means much to the country at a critical time like the one through which we are now passing: Therefore

We, the citizens of Laurens County assembled, do hereby place ourselves on record of expressing our appreciation to our Senators and Congressman for their efforts, and do hereby endorse the many movements they have fostered which have proved beneficial and helpful to the people, expressing our hope that their efforts as to the loans this year, especially, be successful, and that in the future they will so continue their faithful efforts along the same line they have heretofore outlined and strongly advocated.

And further, that we place ourselves on record as endorsing the policy of Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States, wherein he is bringing the country back from a depressed financial condition to one of prosperity and happiness, pledging him our hearty support and unanimous cooperation, commending our Senators and Congressman, who are so patriotically standing behind the administration in carrying out the policies promised to the people, which will eventually bring the Nation to the goal for which she is striving to reach.

Respectfully submitted.

C. A. POWER.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the Members of the House I have requested this time to inform the House that today I am introducing a bill proposing to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act for the purpose of extending to the business interests of this country the same privileges that we have extended to railroads, insurance companies, and every other line of business; that is, to permit them to refinance their business properties in line with the refinancing of farms and homes.

I have had considerable complaint from this class of people who are unable today to go to banks or anywhere else and refinance their mortgages covering business properties. They are struggling with what cash they have and what cash they can get to carry on their various lines of business. It appears to me it is just as necessary to refinance their business property, whereby they will be able to continue and use their funds in their business, as it would be for any other line of activity.

I hope the Membership will give serious consideration to this legislation with the hope that we may be able to have it reported and passed by the House. [Applause.]

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Mr. Speaker, once again I am the recipient of the friendly consideration of this august body, for permission to proceed by unanimous consent, giving me an opportunity to present a few facts bearing upon American-Filipino relations.

On January 17, 1933, the Congress of the United States, by over a two-thirds vote in the House of Representatives and over a two-thirds vote in the United States Senate, approved a Philippine Independence Act. By the terms and conditions of that law—Public, No. 311, Seventy-second Congress—the Philippine Legislature was authorized to provide for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention to draft and formulate a constitution. The deadline set in section 1 of the law is January 17, 1934, because of the provision that action must be taken in this direction within 1 year after the enactment of the act. It is thus seen that the time limit being only 2 days away, and the legislature, under the leadership of Mr. Manuel Quezon, has so far declined to accept the law, and to set in motion the institutional process and mechanism contemplated by the act, a veritable deadlock is about to ensue, and a real crisis impends in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Speaker, I have just returned from the Philippine Islands, after several months spent in visiting various provinces, cities, and municipalities, meeting and conferring not only with our leaders, but with the masses of the people, and I want to apprise the Congress of the important and pertinent facts of the Philippine situation.

The first and most important point I wish to stress, Mr. Speaker, is that the Filipino people continue in their firm conviction that the early grant of Philippine independence is the proper solution of American-Filipino relations. On this fundamental point the Filipinos are united.

The second point I wish to bring to your attention is that the Filipino people themselves have not been given an opportunity to act on the law, nor was a convention called for the purpose of accepting or rejecting the law. The Philippine Legislature, under the domination of Mr. Quezon, resolved to "decline to accept the law in its present form" and appointed a committee to proceed to the United States to seek amendments of the law or the enactment of new legislation. These rejectionists of the independence law, commonly known as "antis" in our country, form one camp of thought.

There is another camp of thought, those who favor the acceptance of the law. This group is formed by the Ninth Philippine Independence Commission, headed by Messrs. Sergio Osmeña and Manuel Roxas, known to the Members of this House; the Pro-Independence Party; the Nonpartisan Civic League for Acceptance, headed by Senator Benigno Aquino; President Rafael Palma, of the University of the Philippines; Dean Maximo Kalaw, of the same institution; and a large portion of our population. To this camp, commonly known as "pros" in the island, I belong. Our recommendation was that the congressional enactment by which America sought to redeem her promise of granting independence to the Philippines be accepted, making it clear that—

Acceptance of the law will not prevent the Filipino people from subsequently petitioning Congress for a modification of its provisions, if such modification were desired by them.

It is our sincere belief that if the Filipino people had been given an opportunity to vote on the independence law approved by Congress on January 17, 1933, it would have been accepted.

This is neither the time nor the place to concern ourselves with the controversies among Filipino leaders. What concerns me most, as a representative of the Filipino people, to whom I owe my first loyalty, is that there be an independence act; for a Resident Commissioner representing my country the independence of my people is supreme. Something practical—something practicable should be done in this present dilemma. I rose to suggest a way out of a difficult situation.

The new Quezon Mission sailed from the Philippines on November 4, 1933, and reached San Francisco on November 27, the same date I left Manila for Washington. Mr. Quezon and his colleagues in the Mission have been in America for about 8 weeks. On December 27 President Roosevelt received the Quezon Mission and the distinguished occupant of the White House wisely asked Mr. Quezon to submit a concrete proposal in writing. The Washington News of that day published the following information regarding that meeting:

F. D. ASKS FILIPINOS TO SUBMIT PROPOSAL

President Roosevelt, at a luncheon today, surprised the Philippine independence delegation by inviting them to submit a concrete proposition on how the Philippines question should be settled.

The President made no personal commitment but assured the mission that he will consider the proposition when submitted.

President Quezon immediately cabled leaders at Manila to arrive at terms of the proposal, which he said would be ready within 1 week.

Quezon said after luncheon that he will proceed immediately to prepare a memorandum in the form of the bill which he favors. His ideas on the proposal were not announced but were expected to favor early independence on economic terms better than contained in the Hare-Hawes-Cutting bill.

The concrete proposal requested by President Roosevelt of Mr. Quezon's Mission has not as yet been submitted. The delay has been a surprise to many leaders of this Government and has irked others to my certain knowledge.

In the Washington Post for January 13, 1934, we read:

* * * Senator BRONSON CUTTING, of New Mexico, indicated after a conference with the President that the next move toward Philippine independence is up to the Filipinos. The present Hawes-Cutting bill providing gradual freedom, already rejected by the island legislature, expires January 17.

"If the Philippine independence bill lapses", he declared, "I cannot conceive of Congress taking up such legislation at this session. If it did take it up, I do not believe the Filipinos could get as good a bill."

* * * The Philippine Independence Mission to this country, headed by Manuel Quezon, an opponent of the Hawes-Cutting measure, has not yet submitted a substitute proposal to the President.

The Washington Evening Star, in its issue for January 12, 1934, published an Associated Press information confirmatory of the fact that Senator CUTTING asserted "after a talk with President Roosevelt that he would make no move to extend the life of the measure, which dies next week"—that is, this week—unless he receives word of a change of attitude by the Philippine Legislature."

The dispatch significantly closes with this paragraph:

CUTTING's declaration, following closely his talk with the President, was generally accepted as the administration's attitude. There were signs that Mr. Roosevelt felt as he did.

Members of this Congress know the standing of Senator CUTTING in this Government. I discharge a duty when I state whereof I know Senator CUTTING has worked unselfishly to advance the interests of the Filipinos and the cause of Philippine Independence. The records show that in the long and arduous process of pushing the Philippine independence bill to final passage, in every controversial point or amendment presented, he invariably voted to sustain the moral obligation of America and the well-being of the Filipinos.

The situation which the Senator from New Mexico paints is meaningful. Its implications are portentous. Something must be done; some definite step must be taken or there will be no independence law and the Philippine question will have to be taken up de novo with all the hazards that a controversial measure must go through in a Congress consisting of a large membership and representing varied and various interests.

The Members of Congress will testify that I have during my incumbency, in season and out of season, sought to enlist their support in favor of the early grant of Philippine independence. For what I have said, for what I have done, I have no regret and I make no apology. I am grateful to the countless friends who have supported me in the fight for an independence act.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. I gladly yield.

Mr. RANKIN. As I understand, the present Legislature of the Philippine Islands was elected before the Independence Act was passed. Is this correct?

Mr. OSIAS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RANKIN. And it is the idea of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands for Congress to pass a resolution continuing the law until after the people of the Philippine Islands have held their next elections and a new legislature could then act.

Mr. OSIAS. That is substantially my idea.

Concretely, I am here today, Mr. Speaker, to plead for the extension of the time mentioned in section 1 of the law for about 9 months. This would enable the people of the Philippine Islands to express themselves on this question.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado and Mr. BLANCHARD rose.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 5 minutes. He is speaking on an important matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mr. OSIAS. Thank you. As I was saying, the gentleman from Mississippi is correct; that the present Philippine Legislature, which has declined to act, was elected before the passage of the law. We shall have an election the first Tuesday of June next and the people will then have an opportunity to express themselves on the question so vital to them and will have had an opportunity to elect the members of a new legislature.

This proposition to extend the time ought to be acceptable to both camps of thought in the Philippines. I hope it will be agreeable to the Quezon Mission, representing those who think the law should not be accepted in its present form, as well as to the legislative and executive branches of the American Government.

The idea of extending the time is agreeable to the members of the Ninth Philippine Independence Commission, to the members of the new pro-Independence Party, to the members of the Civic League for Acceptance, and to countless others in my country who are for the Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act.

In yesterday's issue of the Washington Star there was an Associated Press dispatch from Manila saying that "Aguinaldo favors extending island bill." Mr. Aguinaldo is a member of the Quezon Mission, created by resolution 46 of the legislature. Another dispatch from Manila, published in the New York Herald Tribune of yesterday, reports Senator Osmeña "urging congressional extension of the date", calling "upon all factions to bury the hatchet and press the matter", and asking "the Quezonistas to take the lead, saying the situation is so serious it requires complete forgetfulness of partisan differences."

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OSIAS. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. RANKIN. When will the legislature, the members of which are to be elected in June, regularly convene in session?

Mr. OSIAS. It will convene on July 16.

Mr. BLANTON. Would a resolution passed by Congress which would continue the Independence Act until the 1st of October, for instance, be helpful?

Mr. OSIAS. It certainly would. I am pleading for an extension of time by about 9 months, which will be up to October 17.

Mr. RANKIN. If I may suggest one thing further, were I in the place of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands I would ask for an extension of at least a year, so that when the extension expires it will be at a time when the American Congress will be in session, for something might come up to necessitate the extension of the time again.

Mr. OSIAS. I appreciate the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. Speaker, I am very happy that the sentiment is favorable to doing something practical; something practicable in order to solve the situation. I have been contacting Members of this House and of the Senate, and I want my people to know that the sentiment in the Congress of the United States today—and I speak with knowledge of the facts, although there are some in my own native land who pretend to know more about the sentiment of Congress than I do—is not propitious for a brandnew independence legislation; and Lord knows that if anybody could assure me that we could get a better law, regardless of the paternity or authorship of the measure, I would get behind it 100 percent.

The Pro-Independence Party in the islands is for no policy of obstructionism, and I certainly am not. On the eve of leaving my native shores I made this formal and solemn pledge to the Filipino people:

> Whatever and whoever is inimical to our common good, whatever and whoever retards or obstructs our freedom and independence will meet with my whole-souled opposition. Whatever redounds to the permanent well-being and happiness of the Philippines, whatever makes for the enduring friendship of the peoples of the United States and the Philippine Islands, whatever advances the sacred cause of our national liberty and independence will have my enthusiastic support and loyal cooperation.

In my first statements to the press, in my contacts with officials of the American Government since my return, in my private conferences with the leaders and Members of both Houses of Congress, I made it clear I would support any independence proposal from whatsoever source that could be translated into a law as good as or better than the Independence Act passed by the Seventy-second Congress known as the "Hare-Hawes-Cutting Act."

But, sir, in the absence of a definite proposal from the Quezon Mission, in face of the danger of not having any kind of Philippine independence legislation, I plead for the extension of the time because I believe it is democratic and republican in form and in principle.

Mr. Speaker, times are these which are truly serious and critical. Times are these for all to put aside their differences and get behind something practical, some practicable plan that will solve our relationship. Times are these when the statesmanship of America and the Philippines ought to assert itself and do something to extend the time limit in the law, saving Philippine independence and advancing the frontiers of freedom in the world. [Applause.]

I thank you.

GOLD DEVALUATION PRO-BRITISH

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article I prepared on gold devaluation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from California a serious question. The Herald last Saturday reported the gentleman, in a speech the night before, to have said that every one of the 197 Members of Congress who voted to support the President's policy and program had done so under the dictation of Wall Street. The Herald quoted you as saying:

> I urge Federal workers to write home to their relatives and friends and ask them to start work now for the defeat of Members of the House who voted for only a 5-percent restoration. Congress has been listening to the voice of Wall Street instead of the voice of loyal workers for the Government.

Did the gentleman mean to say the 197 Members were guided by Wall Street?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I do not recall making that statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman make anything like that statement?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I cannot recall the statement I made; but I referred, I believe, to the shadow of Wall Street.

Mr. BLANTON. The shadow of Wall Street controlling the vote of the 197 Members who supported the President?

Mr. HOEPPEL. No; I made no mention whatever about the 197 Members who voted to support the President.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman ought to get the newspaper report and correct it.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I did not see it. I wish somebody would bring it to my attention.

Now that it has been brought to my attention, I recall that I suggested that Federal employees write to their friends and relatives everywhere for the purpose of defeating the Members of Congress who voted against them in the independent offices bill. I do not recall stating that Congress had been listening to the voice of Wall Street, but, if I remember correctly, I did refer to the belief that the shadow of Wall Street was over the White House; which, in my opinion, is self-evident when we are presented with a recommendation for a $10,000,000,000 Budget with all funds therefor to be obtained through the issuance of tax-exempt securities, thus adding to the income of the banking fraternity while our Federal employees, in a majority of instances, do not receive a living wage.

Mr. BLANTON. This is one time in the history of our Government when no shadow of Wall Street hovers over the White House. Every pulse beat of the great heart of the White House is now pulsating for the whole people of our Nation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, early Christian history states that the Prince of Peace was sold for 30 pieces of silver, and if one may judge from the official records of the Congress, it is apparent that our Nation was sold to the high priests of finance in Europe in the demonetization of silver in the act of 1873. Having purchased bonds during the Civil War which were repayable in gold, the international bankers of that period, according to the reports, purchased the vote of the Congress and secured the demonetization of silver, thus virtually doubling the debts our Nation then owed Europe as a result of the Civil War expenditures.

Today, under the new deal, our Nation appears to be drifting toward the same procedure but in inverse order. The devaluation of gold at the ratio of $41.34 per ounce will actually reduce the war and private debts owing the United States by the European nations exactly 50 percent. Unless the nations of Europe join with us in devaluing gold at a stabilized figure, the debts which our citizens owe to Europe, payable in gold, will be actually doubled. True, the devaluation of gold on the part of the United States only depreciates the value of the dollar in the foreign markets and from that viewpoint, permits the nations of the world on the gold standard or gold base to purchase from us at 50 cents on the dollar. The depreciated dollar and the consequent purchase of American products will naturally react on the business and commerce of the nations involved who, to protect their own agriculture and industry, will raise tariff barriers or embargos, in this way frustrating the effect which the devaluation of gold on the part of the United States alone would bring. Thus the foreign advantage which is to accrue from the United States alone devaluing gold pales into insignificance.

The advantage which will come to the United States from the devaluation of gold, according to my viewpoint, is that it will increase the volume of money which is permitted to circulate under existing law, and if honestly and fairly administered, will actually double the amount of money which may be circulated.

If withdrawn into the Treasury before being devaluated, it will add to the balance in our Treasury exactly 100 percent. Our own citizens with secreted coined gold and those with mined gold or gold in manufactured articles will also have their holdings doubled. For the present, however, any increase in the volume of money which, under gold devaluation would be authorized to be manufactured or printed, would be of no benefit to the distressed American citizens unless the control and extension of such augmented supply of money was taken from the brigands in larger financial institutions who control the amount of credit. For this reason any change in the status of our money, without a concomitant change in the medium of control and extension of credit, will merely be placing more money in the hands of the gambling bankers, which they may more readily utilize to purchase tax-exempt securities.

The real advantage of gold devaluation, and, no doubt, the motive of internationalists who favor this procedure, lies in the fact that England produces 70 percent of the gold of the world. Thus devaluing the gold dollar on the basis of $41.34 per ounce will actually add to the potential development of British wealth through the medium of their gold mines, one of which—the Rand mine in South Africa—produces, alone, one half of the gold production of the world. The visit of Montague Norman to our President some time ago, and the subsequent visit of Morgan at the White House, would indicate that British influence is more powerful in the new-deal administration than the mere sipping of tea.

Another advantage accruing to the nations of Europe from gold devaluation is that their present gold holdings of approximately two thirds of the existing gold of the world will be doubled in value and as this amount approximates more than 8 billion dollars, the devaluation of the gold dollar will technically wipe out the war debts owed to the United States. In addition, other benefits will accrue to the international bankers, whose millions of gold, earmarked in the vaults of Europe, will double in value to them through the United States devaluing gold, as appears apparent.

For the present, another large benefit, redounding to the interest of the international bankers, who are as deeply entrenched in Wall Street as they are in Paris or London, is the fact that the present depreciated dollar in Europe gives to these pseudo-American bankers at least 40-percent clear profit on the large purchases of British pounds and French francs which they have made during the past year.

I am of the belief that any procedure to devalue the gold dollar without at the same time remonitizing silver on the basis of 16 to 1 is purely and positively a British maneuver, inasmuch as the principal advantage will accrue to them, since they are the producers and the holders of the gold.

It has been reported authentically that the United States produces 33 percent of the silver of the world and that North America alone produces approximately 75 percent of the silver of the world. If there is to be a change in the price of the commodities of gold and silver, it would appear to be more in accordance with true Americanism that we should increase the value of the commodity (silver) which we ourselves produce, control, and own, rather than increase the commodity (gold) which Great Britain alone owns and controls to the extent of 70 percent.

The nations of Europe who are infected with the virus of gold are manufacturers and very little, if any, benefit will accrue to the American Nation through increasing the commodity exchange wealth of the manufacturing nations who are continuing to purchase, even under our present monetary system, less and less products from us.

If we use common intelligence and increase the commodity—silver—which we ourselves possess, 31 nations of the world, most of them consumers and all on the silver basis, finding their circulating medium—silver—enhanced in value, will flood our markets with orders, and almost over night our factories will be running pell-mell.

The bankers' delight and the Mecca at which they worship is gold and more gold, with a circulating medium of a very limited amount of silver and a large amount of paper, predicated entirely upon gold and tax-exempt securities. This advantage, which they have held through the years and which has made it very easy for them to control the credit of the world, has placed the entire peoples in utter subjection and misery and wholly at the mercy and whim of the small hierarchy, centered in New York, London, and Paris, which controls the destiny of peoples.

The impoverishment of the people is due entirely to the fact that, as a people, we have worshipped the golden calf. Thomas Edison, the wizard of electricity and the thinker of the ages, has stated:

Paper is the money of civilization, gold is of Julius Caesar, and interest is of Satan.

Thomas Edison, in these few words, contributed more to the advancement of the world, if the world will think as he has indicated, than he contributed in all the various manifestations of his intelligence and inventive genius.

It should be clear to any mind that bimetallism, with silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 and gold to be maintained as is at $20.67 per ounce, is more profitable and beneficial to the American Nation than would be silver at this ratio with gold at $41.34 per ounce. The only objection to devaluing gold at the latter ratio is that it would decrease the debts which Europe owes us, and, as Europe is debtor to the United States, the United States, through a devaluation to $41.34 per ounce, would find itself the chief sufferer through the reduction of the debt due us.

With bimetallism, the banking oligarchy would find it impossible to expand and contract the volume of money in circulation through the Federal Reserve System (which should be abolished) by means of its medium of printing-press money when it serves its purpose and the destruction of this same printing-press money when it again serves its purpose. With bimetallism and the establishment of silver at the ratio where it belongs in accordance with its competitive production, the banker would find it less easy to contract and expand the volume of currency in circulation, and for that reason those in the banking crowd will be found advocating a single metallic standard of gold and, in this instance, where it will serve the international banker best, they would revalue gold on a basis of $41.34 per ounce.

The world would move forward beyond any concept of the mind, judging from past experience, if every ounce of gold in existence were disposed of in the depths of the Atlantic. Even silver, as a money, could meet this same fate and the people of the world would actually be the chief beneficiaries. The ideal monetary system would be paper money, issued by the Government and based entirely upon wealth. However, as this progressive idea would encounter too much opposition, due to the propaganda of entrenched wealth, especially that represented by those who own today almost $50,000,000,000 in tax-exempt securities, the ideal plan for the Congress to follow, in my opinion, would be to establish bimetallism on the basis of 16 to 1 for silver, and to maintain the gold dollar at its present value.

I cannot agree with the President's speech wherein he intimated that monetary change or stabilization is not now apropos because of the noncompliance of other nations with his plan. I am a firm believer in America for America and also a firm believer in making America self-sustaining, and with this objective I am sure the President would find Americans everywhere loyally supporting him to the utmost of their strength if he would have the courage, as I believe he has, to immediately stabilize the dollar. Personally, I would recommend 16 to 1 for silver, with the maintenance of the present gold value in the dollar.

All our efforts in the new deal, such as N.R.A. and other experiments, which it is hoped will succeed, will by no stretch of the imagination, however, permanently relieve our unfortunate dilema until the American Government drives the money changers from the temple (the United States Treasury). The United States Government should take over partial or complete control of our banking structure and, through copartnership with the present banking industry, extend credit direct to the people on the basis of their established or creative wealth. The monopoly and control of finance and credit in the hands of the already discredited banking group gives no hope to the American people and the new deal will be a raw deal until the control of credit is taken out of the hands of the international financial monopolists.

CONDUCT OF THE C.C.C. CAMPS

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks with reference to the conduct of the C.C.C. camps in the district I represent and to include therein three short letters I have received from constituents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few observations with respect to the conduct of the C.C.C. camps in the congressional district that I represent in this body.

The officials in charge of these camps have, according to my way of thinking, been most inefficient in the business transactions that they have had with the people of my congressional district. In all the camps that have been operated in my district, a great many complaints have been lodged with me to the effect that the camp officials will not, or do not, pay their bills promptly.

The camp at Hinesville, in Liberty County, used privately owned trucks and civilian truck drivers for a number of months. The owners and drivers of these trucks found it most difficult to get any pay for the service. One man, Mr. J. W. Griner, appealed to me to help him collect what was due him after he had furnished and driven a truck for this camp for approximately 2 months' time, and because he asked my assistance in the premises he was promptly discharged by the camp officials. I had taken the matter up with Mr. Fechner, the director of the emergency conservation work, for Mr. Griner, and, although my efforts did not secure for him his pay, they did cause him to lose his job. I was able to have Mr. Griner put back to work later, and the last information I had on the subject was to the effect that some half dozen or more truck drivers were still working for the Liberty County camp, but that none of them, up to that time, had received any pay, although they had been working for some 4 or 5 months.

I have had complaints from citizens in my own county of Bulloch with reference to accounts due them by the officials of the Brooklet camp.

The owners of a bakery in Vidalia (Toombs County, Ga.), who are my constituents also, tell me that they have sold bread to the camp at Soperton, in Treutlen County, for which they have not been able to collect, although they furnished the bread to this particular camp on June 20, 1933. This debt was contracted 7 months ago. These same people sold bread to the Government for the Reidsville (Tattnall County) camp in October, for which they have not yet been able to collect. This account has been outstanding for 3 months.

I am including with this statement letters from some of my constituents with reference to these situations, as follows:

MARTIN MOTOR CO.,
AUTHORIZED FORD DEALERS,
Hinesville, Ga., July 25, 1933.

Hon. HOMER C. PARKER,
Statesboro, Ga.

DEAR SIR: I am taking the liberty of asking your assistance and advice in the matter of truck hire to the C.C.C. camp located here.

We will have soon completed our second month of service without remuneration, which is hard under the present conditions existing, as there is a certain amount of outlay in expense daily, while other departments have received their checks.

The scale of $4 per day for truck and driver, gas, oil, and upkeep is not in keeping with the scale of wages paid in other departments, where only personal service is rendered, with no expense attached; and it seems as though this should be investigated and the situation relieved, as I do not believe that our Government would intentionally discriminate or accept service below cost of operation, which often occurs where heavy-duty work is required and the truck is in constant operation, such as handling telephone poles or materials.

In case the truck operator is so fortunate as to make every working day in the month, it only amounts to $80; while the country blacksmith who is employed in this camp and local boys employed as foresters are receiving over a hundred dollars per month straight time, with no expense attached.

I do not know who is responsible for this situation, whether the Federal Government or the State, but I will deeply appreciate anything that you may do in the matter, as there are quite a few poor fellows like myself, over the State, who are operating their trucks for this unreasonably low sum, because we have trucks and nothing else to do.

I will appreciate your considering this personal and make an investigation of your own, say in your camp at Brooklet.

Thanking you in advance, and with kindest regards,

Yours very truly,

J. W. GRINER.

HINESVILLE, GA., August 23, 1933.

Hon. HOMER C. PARKER,
Statesboro, Ga.

DEAR SIR: This will introduce to you my friend, Mr. J. W. Griner, of this city. He intends having an interview with you on matters concerning his welfare, and I take the liberty of recommending him to your kind attention. I have known Mr. Griner for about 20 years, and I know him to be a gentleman of excellent acquirements, and I know him to be responsible to the extent of his engagements. Any attention or favor that you render him will be considered a personal favor, which I shall be happy to reciprocate.

Very sincerely yours,

J. MADISON SMITH.

SMITH BROS. BAKERY,
Vidalia, Ga., January 10, 1934.

Hon. HOMER C. PARKER,
Congressman First District,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: We are writing to complain that you good people are not furnishing our C.C.C. camps with money to take care of their bills promptly.

June 20, 1933, we made shipment of 106 pounds of bread to the camp at Soperton and have failed to collect yet. They always tell us that they are out of funds and will get to us soon.

In October 1933, or nearly 3 months ago, we started serving your camp at Reidsville, and have not been able to collect. I was down there on other business yesterday and called by to see the commanding officer and was told by him that you folks had not furnished them money sufficient to pay their bills, that he hoped to be able to get to us sometime soon.

We certainly appreciate the splendid business your camps have favored us with, and also the courtesy extended by the officers in charge, but of course would be glad to collect occasionally.

Thanking you for anything you may be able to do for us, we are,

Yours very truly,

SMITH BROS. BAKERY.
EARL SMITH.

On September 16 last, I wrote a letter to Hon. Robert Fechner, director, Washington, in which I made these statements:

Up to this time the other truck drivers have received no pay for the services that they have rendered, although they have been working for the Government for nearly 4 months. Mr. Griner finally was paid for what work he did in June and July, on the complaint registered by me. He has not been paid for August and September, and, as I have stated before, the other drivers have received nothing whatsoever. They have bought gas and oil from filling-station operators in the community, and I understand some of them are almost bankrupt, due to the fact that they cannot collect for the gas and oil that they have sold to these people to use in trucks that they have operated for the Government.

The people of Liberty cannot understand why these accounts cannot be adjusted.

I have told some of the leading citizens of Liberty County that I would take the matter up with you and advise you as to conditions. I told them that you are a former resident of our congressional district and that I am sure you would want to do all that you possibly can for the people of Liberty County, especially since your subordinates have created this indebtedness there and since it remains unpaid.

Of course, I do not know just why these matters have gotten into the shape they are in, but I think it would be rather hard to justify that kind of procedure. It appears to me that whatever the trouble is it should be corrected at once and the dealings that the C.C.C. people have with the people of Liberty County and other counties of the State where your camps are located should be pleasant, agreeable, and on a high plane.

I have talked to Mr. Thurmond and Mr. Lufburrow about this situation and apparently they have not been able to make proper adjustments. I shall greatly appreciate it if you will look into the situation there and advise me what can be done. Any consideration that you can show to these good people will be greatly appreciated by me and by everyone who is interested in the welfare of the Liberty County citizenry.

(Mr. Thurmond is the district forester and Mr. Lufburrow is the State forester.)

On October 7 I again wrote to Director Fechner, in which letter I made these statements:

Mr. C. E. Smith, who is my constituent, came in to see me today and informs me that he has been furnishing a truck and driver for the C.C.C. camp at Brooklet, Bulloch County, Ga., since July, and up to this time has not received anything in payment for the services of the truck and driver. He states that the Government owes him $124.

As I have written you before, there is general dissatisfaction, and I am receiving many complaints regarding the delay in the payment of these bills. My people are badly in need of the money due them, and I am most anxious that they be given relief without any further delay.

Assuring you that any action you are able to take to expedite the settlement of these accounts will be highly appreciated, I am

Yours sincerely,

HOMER C. PARKER.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—OUR FINANCIAL AND MONETARY SYSTEM (S.DOC. NO. 114)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Congress:

In conformity with the progress we are making in restoring a fairer price level and with our purpose of arriving eventually at a less variable purchasing power for the dollar, I ask the Congress for certain additional legislation to improve our financial and monetary system. By making clear that we are establishing permanent metallic reserves in the possession and ownership of the Federal Government, we can organize a currency system which will be both sound and adequate.

The issuance and control of the medium of exchange which we call "money" is a high prerogative of government. It has been such for many centuries. Because they were scarce, because they could readily be subdivided and transported, gold and silver have been used either for money or as a basis for forms of money which in themselves had only nominal intrinsic value.

In pure theory, of course, a government could issue mere tokens to serve as money—tokens which would be accepted at their face value if it were certain that the amount of these tokens were permanently limited and confined to the total amount necessary for the daily cash needs of the community. Because this assurance could not always or sufficiently be given, governments have found that reserves or bases of gold and silver behind their paper or token currency added stability to their financial systems.

There is still much confusion of thought which prevents a world-wide agreement creating a uniform monetary policy. Many advocate gold as the sole basis of currency; others advocate silver; still others advocate both gold and silver whether as separate bases, or on a basis with a fixed ratio, or on a fused basis.

We hope that, despite present world confusion, events are leading to some future form of general agreement. The recent London agreement in regard to silver was a step, though only a step, in this direction.

At this time we can usefully take a further step, which we hope will contribute to an ultimate world-wide solution.

Certain lessons seem clear. For example, the free circulation of gold coins is unnecessary, leads to hoarding, and tends to a possible weakening of national financial structures in times of emergency. The practice of transferring gold from one individual to another or from the government to an individual within a nation is not only unnecessary, but is in every way undesirable. The transfer of gold in bulk is essential only for the payment of international trade balances.

Therefore it is a prudent step to vest in the government of a nation the title to and possession of all monetary gold within its boundaries and to keep that gold in the form of bullion rather than in coin.

Because the safe-keeping of this monetary basis rests with the Government, we have already called in the gold which was in the possession of private individuals or corporations. There remains, however, a very large weight in gold bullion and coins which is still in the possession or control of the Federal Reserve banks.

Although under existing law there is authority, by Executive act, to take title to the gold in the possession or control of the Reserve banks, this is a step of such importance that I prefer to ask the Congress by specific enactment to vest in the United States Government title to all supplies of American-owned monetary gold, with provision for the payment therefor in gold certificates. These gold certificates will be, as now, secured at all times dollar for dollar by gold in the Treasury—gold for each dollar of such weight and fineness as may be established from time to time.

Such legislation places the right, title, and ownership to our gold reserves in the Government itself; it makes clear the Government's ownership of any added dollar value of the country's stock of gold which would result from any decrease of the gold content of the dollar which may be made in the public interest. It would also, of course, with equal justice, cast upon the Government the loss of such dollar value if the public interest in the future should require an increase in the amount of gold designated as a dollar.

The title to all gold being in the Government, the total stock will serve as a permanent and fixed metallic reserve which will change in amount only so far as necessary for the settlement of international balances or as may be required by a future agreement among the nations of the world for a redistribution of the world stock of monetary gold.

With the establishment of this permanent policy, placing all monetary gold in the ownership of the Government as a bullion base for its currency, the time has come for a more certain determination of the gold value of the American dollar. Because of world uncertainties, I do not believe it desirable in the public interest that an exact value be now fixed. The President is authorized by present legislation to fix the lower limit of permissible revaluation at 50 percent. Careful study leads me to believe that any revaluation at more than 60 percent of the present statutory value would not be in the public interest. I, therefore, recommend to the Congress that it fix the upper limit of permissible revaluation at 60 percent.

That we may be further prepared to bring some greater degree of stability to foreign exchange rates in the interests of our people, there should be added to the present power of the Secretary of the Treasury to buy and sell gold at home and abroad express power to deal in foreign exchange as such. As a part of this power, I suggest that, out of the profits of any devaluation, there should be set up a fund of $2,000,000,000 for such purchases and sales of gold, foreign exchange, and Government securities as the regulation of the currency, the maintenance of the credit of the Government, and the general welfare of the United States may require.

Certain amendments of existing legislation relating to the purchase and sale of gold and to other monetary matters would add to the convenience of handling current problems in this field. The Secretary of the Treasury is prepared to submit information concerning such changes to the appropriate committees of the Congress.

The foregoing recommendations relate chiefly to gold. The other principal precious metal—silver—has also been used from time immemorial as a metallic base for currencies as well as for actual currency itself. It is used as such by probably half the population of the world. It constitutes a very important part of our own monetary structure. It is such a crucial factor in much of the world's international trade that it cannot be neglected.

On December 21, 1933, I issued a proclamation providing for the coinage of our newly mined silver and for increasing our reserves of silver bullion, thereby putting us among the first nations to carry out the silver agreement entered into by 66 governments at the London Conference. This agreement is distinctly a step in the right direction and we are proceeding to perform our part of it.

All of the 66 nations agreed to refrain from melting or debasing their silver coins, to replace paper currency of small denominations with silver coins and to refrain from legislation that would depreciate the value of silver in the world markets. Those nations producing large quantities of silver agreed to take specified amounts from their domestic production and those holding and using large quantities agreed to restrict the amount they would sell during the 4 years covered by the agreement.

If all these undertakings are carried out by the governments concerned, there will be a marked increase in the use and value of silver.

Governments can well, as they have in the past, employ silver as a basis for currency, and I look for a greatly increased use. I am, however, withholding any recommendation to the Congress looking to further extension of the monetary use of silver because I believe that we should gain more knowledge of the results of the London agreement and of our other monetary measures.

Permit me once more to stress two principles. Our national currency must be maintained as a sound currency which, insofar as possible, will have a fairly constant standard of purchasing power and be adequate for the purposes of daily use and the establishment of credit.

The other principle is the inherent right of government to issue currency and to be the sole custodian and owner of the base or reserve of precious metals underlying that currency. With this goes the prerogative of government to determine from time to time the extent and nature of the metallic reserve. I am confident that the Nation will well realize the definite purpose of the Government to maintain the credit of that Government, and, at the same time, to provide a sound medium of exchange which will serve the needs of our people.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not refer the message from the President for the present.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES TRANSMITTING EXECUTIVE ORDER NO. 65 (H.DOC. NO. 217)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

Pursuant to the provisions of section 20, title I, of the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", approved March 20, 1933, I am transmitting herewith certified copies of Executive Order No. 6547 (Veterans' Regulation No. 2 (b)), approved by me on January 2, 1934.

This veterans' regulation amended Veterans' Regulation No. 2 (a), approved by me on July 28, 1933, and was issued in accordance with the terms of title I, Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 15, 1934.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. May I ask if the Speaker has referred the first message from the President?

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated he would withhold for the present reference of the message from the President. There is a matter the Chair wants to look into.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I thought the message indicated very clearly that it should go to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures under the jurisdiction which this committee has under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to look into that and refer the message tomorrow.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER. This is Consent Day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

The Clerk read the title of the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair inform the House about the program? This is not as I understood the program for today. We have no one here who will be prepared to look after the Consent Calendar. I understood a matter was coming up from the Banking and Currency Committee or from the Committee on Agriculture the first thing today, in accordance with the unanimous request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

May I ask, under the circumstances, what the program is going to be for today? I understood from the gentleman's request at the end of last week that we would take up 2 regular bills today, 1 from the Committee on Banking and Currency and 1 from the Committee on Agriculture. I did not understand that the Consent Calendar would be called.

Mr. BYRNS. No; that was not included in my statement to the House on last Friday.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I thought.

Mr. BYRNS. There are only about seven bills on the Consent Calendar. I have looked the calendar over, and from the titles I do not think there will be many objections. There might possibly be objection to two or three of them. I would not want to have the Members misled by my statement last Friday.

Mr. SNELL. I do not say we were misled. I just misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not mean that. If this takes the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] unaware as to the calling of the Consent Calendar, personally I would like to see it go over.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we have not had time to look these bills over. From a cursory examination of the titles of the bills, we would be bound to object to practically all of them until we have had time to investigate. We have not had the necessary time. If the gentleman will put it over until next consent day, I do not think anyone will lose any time by that procedure.

Mr. BYRNS. I am rather embarrassed in connection with the request.

Mr. SNELL. It is not a question of embarrassment. We do not want to embarrass anyone; but we just simply did not understand it.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS], I ask unanimous consent that the Consent Calendar go over until its regular call.

Mr. SNELL. To be dispensed with for today.

Mr. BYRNS. That is my understanding.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS]?

There was no objection.

H.R. 6191

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of this session of Congress I introduced a bill providing for the reduction of the gold content of the dollar 50 percent and for the free coinage of silver. I presented this bill with a statement to the President and I ask unanimous consent to publish that brief statement in the RECORD today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Speaker, on the first day of this session I introduced a bill (H.R. 6191) providing for reducing the present gold content of the gold dollar 50 percent, and for the free and unlimited coinage of silver dollars of the present weight and fineness. The bill was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and Chairman SOMERS tells me he will give early hearing on this measure. I prepared a short statement upon H.R. 6191, and sent it to Col. Marvin McIntyre, Secretary to the President, for its submission to President Roosevelt.

The statement and the bill are as follows:

STATEMENT

H.R. 6191 reduces the gold content of the dollar 50 percent, viz, to 12$\frac{9}{10}$ grains of gold. It leaves the content of the standard silver dollar the same as at present, viz, 412½ grains of silver. The ratio of silver to gold in the proposed bill is, therefore, 32 to 1. This is, in effect, the present ratio of value for newly mined silver at the mint, such silver now being paid for at 64½ cents per ounce, by the coinage of one half the silver offered at the mint into dollars of 412½ grains. Under H.R. 6191 there would be no change in the present standard silver dollar. The silver dollar would be maintained at the present standard of weight and fineness and at the value established by the President for newly mined American silver, viz, 32 to 1, with the added provision of free and unlimited coinage of silver.

The free coinage of silver, under the terms of this bill, would not drive gold from circulation by the force of Gresham's law for the reason that practically all gold is now in the possession of the Federal Government. Gold is represented in the circulating money of the country by varied forms of paper currency.

Under H.R. 6191 all forms of outstanding currencies payable in gold, silver, or lawful money would remain exactly as at present. All advantage to holders of gold would accrue to the Federal Government. The provisions of this bill would double the number of gold dollars available to the Government for reserves, for note issues, or for redemption of notes already issued.

The plan proposed is real controlled inflation; it is inflation in the safest possible form, and is limited to the amount of gold and silver actually available for coinage or sale. The best available estimates are that an increase of around 300 millions in coinage of standard silver dollars is the limit possible under present available stocks of silver.

The issuance of bimetallic money, as provided by H.R. 6191, would create a safe and sound money system, which would result in an immediate and material advance in prices, give reemployment to labor, stimulate agriculture and manufactures, and greatly enlarge the demand for American products in foreign trade.

The possibility of liquidating our Federal debts, made necessary for national recovery, would be infinitely improved, and the national credit would be strengthened thereby. Inflation of Government debts is necessary at present to provide employment, stimulate trade, and increase prices.

To restate it briefly, cutting the contents of the gold dollar in half and authorizing free coinage of silver dollars of the present standard is a sound money policy, will materially increase prices, provide means for the liquidation of Government obligations, and avoid the dangers of uncontrolled inflation by issues of fiat paper money.

H.R. 6191

A bill to establish a bimetallic system of currency, employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold to silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be free coinage of both gold and silver, at the ratio fixed in this act, subject to the conditions and limitations now provided by law with respect to the coinage of gold; and all the laws of the United States relating to such coinage or to recoinage, exchange, or conversion of coin, bars, or bullion of gold, shall apply equally, so far as practicable, to silver.

SEC. 2. The dollar shall consist of 12$\frac{9}{10}$ grains of gold nine tenths fine, or of 412½ grains of silver nine tenths fine, and shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with this standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain such parity.

SEC. 3. Gold and silver dollars of the standard weight and fineness provided in this act shall be legal tender for the payment of all debts, both public and private, and the United States Treasury may pay the obligations of the Federal Government in either standard gold or silver dollars at its option.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 6804) to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to continue its functions until such time as the President shall by proclamation determine, to provide funds for the continuance of such functions, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (1) until February 1, 1935, or until such prior date as may be fixed by proclamation of the President, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized by law to perform, and the liquidation and winding up of its affairs as provided for by section 13 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act is hereby postponed until the expiration of such period or until the date fixed by such proclamation, whichever is earlier.

(2) No funds shall be disbursed on any commitment or agreement to make a loan or advance hereafter made by Reconstruction Finance Corporation after the expiration of 1 year from the date of such commitment or agreement; but within the period of such 1-year limitation no provision of law terminating any of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be construed to prohibit disbursement of funds on prior commitments or agreements to make loans or advances.

(3) The amount of notes, debentures, and bonds or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended and supplemented, is hereby increased by $850,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question? As I understood the program, this bill was to be taken up under the general rules of the House, but if I understood the gentleman correctly a moment ago he moved to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate the gentleman has the right to do that on this day if the Speaker recognizes the gentleman for that purpose, and I do not know that I have any special desire to change that program; but it may be necessary to have a longer time for discussion than the 40 minutes we would have under suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I shall yield half of the time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire more time or does the gentleman think we ought to have more time for debate?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time, but gentleman have come here with the expectation that there would be considerable debate, and I suggest that we go through the motions of extending the time and then get through as soon as we can.

Mr. STEAGALL. How much further time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. LUCE. Oh, I would suggest that we might start with an hour on the side.

Mr. STEAGALL. Would not an hour altogether be satisfactory to the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, was any agreement reached with reference to an extension of the time beyond the 40 minutes?

Mr. SNELL. It will be necessary to do that now.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that if he thinks an hour on the side necessary or would be desired by the House, I shall be glad to agree to that.

Mr. SNELL. I suggest the gentleman agree to that.

Mr. LUCE. Yes; I think that would be desirable.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is perfectly agreeable to me, and I make the request, Mr. Speaker, that the time for debate be extended so as to make the total time 2 hours, one half to be controlled by myself and one half by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that time for debate be extended to 2 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. Is there objection?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so for the purpose of asking for a clarification of the situation. Do I understand there will be no opportunity offered the Membership of the House to amend this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, under a motion to suspend the rules, no amendments are in order, as the gentleman is well aware.

Mr. McFADDEN. I may say to the gentleman in that respect that consent to consider this bill today was given with the express understanding it would come up by unanimous consent and there would be opportunity to amend the bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. I was not present when the suggestion was made on Friday that this bill be taken up under a consent agreement, and I am now simply availing myself of the rule which makes the motion in order on suspension day.

Mr. BYRNS. And may I say that I made the request that this bill and the bill relating to farm loans be given a privileged status and the request was granted. I stated that I expected the bills would be called up under the general rules of the House, but, of course, that did not preclude action under the general rules of the House which provide for suspensions; and even if the gentleman or the House had objected to my request for a privileged status for the bill, this motion would be in order today because it is suspension day.

I made the request without consultation with the gentleman from Alabama, who did not happen to be on the floor at that particular time, in the hope that the bill could be taken up and disposed of today, because it is a matter of great importance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Tennessee has not the floor. I am reserving the right to object, and I have not finished my statement.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee, frankly, that the Membership of the House understood this bill would come up under the general rules of the House and that amendments would be in order. Apparently, we are now to be deprived of that right. There is very little use of discussing the bill, I will say to the gentleman; frankly, if there is to be no opportunity of amendment, there is no use to discuss the bill. This places the bill in exactly the same category as the last bill that came up under the gag rule. I do not think it is fair to the Membership of the House that a measure of this importance should be brought up in this manner. It is a breach of good faith to the Members of this House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. This being suspension day, if there had been no agreement to take up the bill, the Speaker could recognize any Member to pull out of his pocket a bill and move to suspend the rules.

Mr. McFADDEN. That does not change the situation. The impression was that the bill will be considered and be open for amendment. There is nothing under this motion for a Member of the House to do but acquiesce in the bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I will say that I expected this to be called up, and I did not have in mind that this was suspension day. Of course, the general rules of the House provide for motions to suspend the rules, and the gentleman from Alabama is not precluded from making that motion by any request that I made from the floor of the House.

Mr. PARSONS. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, does this bill permit the R.F.C. to subscribe for preferred stock in a reorganized bank during 1934?

Mr. STEAGALL. Under existing law the R.F.C. will continue to issue their obligations and raise funds for the purpose of subscribing to preferred stock.

The $850,000,000 carried in the bill is not necessary to carry out the provisions now in the law for subscriptions to preferred stock. The present law sets no limit upon the borrowing power of the Corporation to obtain funds for loans upon preferred stock.

Mr. PARSONS. What is that amount for?

Mr. STEAGALL. For all other purposes than that to which the R.F.C. is devoting its funds.

Mr. PARSONS. And there is nothing in the R.F.C. amendment which will prohibit their taking stock in those banks?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is true.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Reserving the right to object, there are many Members here very much interested in obtaining certain amendments to this class of legislation. I feel that school teachers' salary warrants are as good a class of security upon which to base loans of money as can be provided, for the reason that they are charges upon the assets of certain communities. I should like to see an amendment that would limit the salary of those who obtain loans from the R.F.C., saying that those who are paid a salary in excess of $25,000 shall not procure a loan. We know that some railroads pay their presidents $60,000 and up and other business concerns pay their officials as much as a hundred thousand dollars, and it seems to me it is a fraud on the taxpayers to make such loans. Now, I hope the gentleman can assure the House that we shall have some other legislation on the same subject so that amendments can be offered in that regard.

Mr. STEAGALL. It is my hope that during the session the Committee on Banking and Currency will give consideration to the various proposals that are offered from time to time to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. It is the desire now that the extension of the existence of the corporation with additional funds be supplied for the reason that their authority will terminate on the 27th of this month unless legislation is passed.

Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama that the time be extended 2 hours, one half to be controlled by himself and one half by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, it is well recognized by the Committee on Banking and Currency that Members of the House desire consideration of various proposals amendatory of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act. Members of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, as the servants of the House, are sympathetic with many suggestions proposed in connection with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, and they will be fully considered by the committee during the present session of Congress. But under existing law, on the 22d of this month the authority of the Corporation must terminate, and its funds will become exhausted unless some legislation like that now proposed is passed prior to the 22d day of this month.

The bill before us provides that the services of the Corporation, within the limits of existing law, may be continued until the 1st of February 1935 and that commitments for loans under existing law shall be executed within the period of 1 year from the time of commitment. The third provision of the bill provides for an increase of the funds of the Corporation, or the obligations that may be incurred by the Corporation in raising funds in the amount of $850,000,000. In short, the bill before the House provides for extending the service of the Corporation down to February 1, 1935, and adds $850,000,000 to the amount of obligations which may be incurred to secure funds for the use of the Corporation in this service. Only something like $15,000,000 are now left available to the Corporation for loans. The collections that the Corporation anticipates will not exceed $50,000,000 a month. It is estimated less than that, but $50,000,000 is the maximum.

The Corporation has pending now more than a billion dollars of applications for loans upon the assets of closed banks, and on December 1, 1933, the Corporation had made commitments for such loans in the amount of $590,000,000. They have pending two thousand and more applications for accommodations in the purchase of preferred stock in banks that are undertaking to meet requirements for membership in the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation. There are $2,600,000,000 of deposits in banks that closed their doors within the last year, and a very large amount of frozen deposits in banks whose doors were closed prior to the 1st of January 1933. It is estimated that a large amount of these deposits in closed banks have for their protection assets entirely solvent, if liquidated in an orderly way, so that property may not be sacrificed by precipitate foreclosures and forced sales.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not know a service more desirable than to relieve depositors in the United States who have suffered during these recent years from having their funds tied up indefinitely in closed banks, the assets of which must be sacrificed at great loss to depositors unless some constructive method is provided for an orderly administration of these assets.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOXEY). Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is the medium through which the President expects to finance most of the major relief operations of the Government during the next year, and that under section 9 of the original act the amount that might be outstanding at any one time was limited to $2,000,000,000, and this merely increases it to $2,850,000,000.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is correct.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am interested in more assistance to small industry. So that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may know the gentleman's attitude, and so that I also may know his attitude, I ask the chairman whether or not it is contemplated to expand and liberalize that which is now being done toward loans to small industry, and if possible, direct loans.

Mr. STEAGALL. One purpose of the legislation now before us is to afford opportunity to the Corporation to render the service which the gentleman has in mind, but there is no provision for direct loans such as those to which he refers. The Corporation is now undertaking to meet the problem suggested through mortgage-loan companies in the organization of which the Corporation aids to the extent of supplying necessary capital in some instances. I sympathize with what the gentleman desires. I am on record as having voted for the very provision which he thinks desirable to have incorporated in the Reconstruction Finance Act now, but it is urgent that the bill now before the House be passed expeditiously in order that the activities of the Corporation within its present powers may not be terminated on the 22d of January. I hope, as I said before, that our committee will have an opportunity to consider the views of the gentleman and others who desire further amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman state what interest the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will receive on these loans?

Mr. STEAGALL. I could only give the gentleman what have been the rates heretofore. Of course, the rates of the Corporation are subject to change. The gentleman is aware that the rates have been liberalized under the present administration; and I think, whatever may be his view with respect to the service of the Corporation, he will agree that the Corporation has been liberal in the matter of rates.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Will the gentleman state what they have been in the past?

Mr. STEAGALL. I could not give the gentleman the rates from time to time. I have not the figures before me, but I should be glad to supply them and put them in the RECORD. The rate was fixed at 5½ percent in the beginning, and there have been reductions. I think the last rate was fixed at 4 percent.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. TRUAX. Will the gentleman state whether or not money is loaned to mortgage-loan companies that charge 3 percent a month interest rate.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is asking me about details as to which I am not informed.

Mr. TRUAX. I notice a recent statement, if the gentleman will permit me to give it, where $195,000,000 was loaned to mortgage-loan companies and then again $34,000,000 to mortgage companies, and I am wondering if this money goes to the loan sharks.

I was wondering if this money is loaned to so-called "loan sharks", who close out the farmers and home owners of this country after receiving those loans?

Mr. STEAGALL. I think I am justified in saying that the gentleman's information is entirely erroneous.

Mr. TRAUX. I am asking for enlightenment on the subject.

Mr. STEAGALL. I have no detailed information, but I am sure such loans have not been made.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. WEIDEMAN. I think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] refers to such companies as the Household Finance Corporation and other companies which, in States where it is permissible to loan money for 3 percent a month, have made such loans. I wonder if the chairman knows of his own knowledge whether the Household Finance Corporation, for instance, has received a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not have a list of the loans before me, and I cannot inform the gentleman.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. What is the gentleman's acquaintance with Mr. Jones' views on the subject of direct loans to industries? If so, will he kindly tell us what his views are toward direct loans?

Mr. STEAGALL. The chairman of the Board did not discuss anything before our committee except the legislation now offered, for the reason that it was recognized by him and by the committee that there was not sufficient time left for consideration of this bill before the date on which its effectiveness would expire, to consider various proposals that are desired in the form of amendments to the act. The chairman of the Board frankly stated to the committee that the Board was suggesting this legislation because of the necessities of the situation, and that any additional legislation was, of course, a matter for congressional action, and that the Board was ready and willing to execute any duties imposed by the Congress.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. Can the gentleman state what the probability is as to whether his committee will take up later for consideration the question of making direct loans to industry?

Mr. STEAGALL. No time has been set and no understanding has been reached by the committee, but I have stated repeatedly today that I, for one, hope that the committee will have an opportunity to consider that question.

Mr. LUDLOW. Is it suggested you may have hearings on that subject?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not know that anybody has suggested hearings. There are various suggestions and proposals, some in the form of bills now pending before the committee, and I am sure the committee desires to consider those measures.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. For my own enlightenment, will the gentleman tell me to what date the life of the Corporation is extended under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. Until the 1st of February 1935.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I was called out of the Chamber and the gentleman may have discussed this feature of the proposition, but I should like to have the chairman of the committee state, in general terms of course, briefly—because I do not want to take up too much of his time—the present situation with reference to the approval of loans by the Public Works Board, as filed and approved by the various State boards, and the connection of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation with final approval, and the furnishing of the money. The gentleman is well acquainted with the situation in our own State, where it appears we are very much behind in securing what ought to be our real allotment of the benefits of that law. Has any arrangement been contemplated to extend any features of the bill, or has there been any reservation of the fund so that those States which have not been taken care of will be taken care of?

Mr. STEAGALL. The bill before us does not deal with those matters. It simply provides an enlargement of the funds of the Corporation for the general uses set forth in the law and not for specific advancements such as were made by the Corporation to the Public Works and to the C.W.A.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought if the gentleman had that information, although it is not related to this bill, he might give us the benefit of it.

Mr. STEAGALL. I think I can say to the gentleman that it is contemplated that that service will be continued and all necessary funds supplied to meet the requirements.

Mr. THURSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. THURSTON. Can the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency tell us what proportion of the $850,000,000 will be loaned to railroads?

Mr. STEAGALL. It is not thought that the demands for further loans to railroads will exceed fifty or seventy-five million dollars.

Mr. THURSTON. If those additional loans are made to railroads, will that mean they will not be required to reduce their freight rates and readjust their capital structure?

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, the gentleman understands that we are simply extending the authority for loans under existing law; that each applicant for a loan will have to make its own showing before the Board; and that all those things that relate to the merits of a loan and the service to be rendered to the public will be considered by the Board, and, of course, are not embodied in the provisions of this bill.

Mr. THURSTON. If we continue generous loans, of course, there will not be any reduction in freight rates.

Mr. STEAGALL. We are not attempting to deal with freight rates in this bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us what the request was from Mr. Jones, the head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to Congress when they asked for this legislation? What was the total amount he asked for?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that Mr. Jones did not ask for any specific amount. He simply outlined to the committee what he thought could be done with a half-billion dollars and what could be done with a larger amount. The same procedure was had in the Senate committee.

The committee of the House fixed the amount at $850,000,000, which was the same amount upon which the Senate committee had agreed. Some Members favored a larger amount and some a smaller amount.

Mr. McFADDEN. The reason I asked the question is due to the fact that the hearings before your committee disclose that Mr. Jones apparently asked for only $500,000,000 over there.

Further substantiation of that is the introduction of the two bills.

Mr. STEAGALL. No. I may say to the gentleman that Mr. Jones fixed $500,000,000 as the minimum; and I may say also that the bill was originally drawn without naming the amount. The amount was determined in the Committee on Banking and Currency.

Mr. McFADDEN. Was the $350,000,000 of the total $850,000,000 which is provided in this bill added in the Senate committee?

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot answer the gentleman. I cannot say whether or not the Senate committee added $350,000,000; whether the bill which they had under consideration before them provided for $1,000,000,000 and their action represented a reduction to $850,000,000; or whether their bill provided $500,000,000 and they added $350,000,000. The only information our committee had was to the effect that the Senate had fixed $850,000,000 as the amount to be added to the funds of the Corporation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield right there and answer this question?

Mr. STEAGALL. How many more questions has the gentleman? I must save some time for other Members who desire to discuss the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. I have enough questions to elicit information which I, as a Member of the House, am entitled to.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield once more.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is it not a fact that Mr. Jones stated to the committee when he appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency that he had passed by the White House and informed the President that the Senators had raised this appropriation to $850,000,000 from $500,000,000, and that he wanted to give the President the amount before he came to the gentleman's committee and that the President told him that $850,000,000 was all right if the Senators wanted it; or words to that effect? I may say to the gentleman that I read that Saturday last from the hearings of his committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman that I think Mr. Jones, chairman of the board of the corporation, made a statement substantially to the effect of that made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. LUDLOW. Will the gentleman kindly state if he has any information or idea as to what proportion of this $850,000,000 will be loaned as working capital to industries in order that they may start operations?

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot anticipate the extent of this service, but I may say that the Board informed the Committee on Banking and Currency that one of the purposes contemplated and one of the chief things for which this legislation is desired is to enable the Corporation to enlarge the particular service to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Am I correct in assuming that the original act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation provided that loans should not be made to foreign governments? In other words, are loans to foreign governments permitted under existing law?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not think the original act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation used the specific language employed by the gentleman; but there was certainly no authority conferred for loans to foreign governments and we were very particular to include language in the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act forbidding loans upon transactions abroad which involved us in any way with the credits and transactions to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BRITTEN. If the gentleman will yield further, I am wondering, with that in mind, how the $4,000,000 was loaned to Russia last spring?

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, at a later time the Corporation was required to furnish funds for loans on farm products to finance the activities of the Government in extending aid to agriculture, and it was in that connection that the Russian transaction was had.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Did the chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation make a recommendation for an allocation for drainage and irrigation districts?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; no provision is made for such an allocation in this bill, but this is one of the activities in which the corporation has been engaged and which it desires to continue.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I understand, but did the chairman make a recommendation?

Mr. STEAGALL. The chairman outlined to us the services of the Corporation and included the service rendered in that connection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a further question? And I may say to the gentleman from Alabama I am serious in these questions.

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BRITTEN. Is the gentleman himself quite satisfied that no money in the hands of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can be loaned to Russia as a government under existing law?

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not think any such provision is in the law, nor do I think any such transactions are contemplated.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Some of us wish to enlarge the scope of the R.F.C. For instance, we wish to permit States, counties, municipalities, school districts, and so on, to refinance themselves through this agency, wherever they cannot be refinanced through the medium of private banks. Will those of us interested in this and kindred pertinent amendments to this act be given a hearing by the gentleman's committee during this session?

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi that he is a member of the Appropriations Committee of this House and has a larger hold upon the purse-strings of the Government than I have. I am in sympathy with what the gentleman desires. I have already stated—possibly the gentleman was not here—that I hope the Committee on Banking and Currency later during the session will have an opportunity to consider the proposals the gentleman desires along with many others suggested by other Members of the House.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The gentleman knows that the Appropriations Committee cannot make an appropriation unless there has been previous authorization. The gentleman's committee would have to pass legislation on this subject before an appropriation could be made.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for one more question.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has referred to the fact that the assets of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation were being used to take from banks and other institutions frozen assets. I think this is correct, is it not?

Mr. STEAGALL. Substantially so.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us to what extent these funds have been used for the purpose of relieving banks of contracts and obligations of foreign countries which the banks held?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have no information whatever of any such activity as the gentleman mentions.

Mr. McFADDEN. Can the gentleman tell us how the loan of $40,000,000 to China was arranged through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield further. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I cannot use all the time of the committee. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I think it most unfortunate that this important piece of legislation, involving an authorization of $850,000,000, should come in under a suspention of the rules, so that no Member can offer an amendment or move to recommit.

This is a nonpartisan measure. It may be one of the few in that category coming up before this Congress. It is an important measure that should have been thrown open to amendment. I believe there are many on both sides of the House that would like to offer amendments in order to give much needed financial assistance to industry, either through banks or through mortgage companics. This is more important today than for a long time past, due to the action of the Congress in passing a very drastic securities bill. I am in favor of the principle of the Securities Act, but I believe the Securities Act must be liberalized in order that capital may flow into industry freely, and until that time comes, of course, we must appropriate money for the R.F.C. in order to provide capital for legitimate industry. That is what we are doing today.

I hope that the Members on my side will support the legislation. The R.F.C. originated under a Republican administration, and as such I believe it has done more to get us out of the depression than all of the panaceas and experiments of the brain trust that have been offered or considered in the last 10 months. There is no reason, therefore, why the Republican Members should not support the legislation as it stands. I will say to the chairman of the committee to which I have just been appointed this morning that as a new member, if I had such right, I would offer an amendment increasing the appropriation by $500,000,000, so that mortgage companies could make loans direct to industry. If that was not the proper way to go about it, I would want to work out some plan for banks to rediscount the money through the R.F.C. to make loans to legitimate industries in America that are unable at the present time to get money from banks.

The principle involved here is the loaning of Government money on collateral. This is a principle emanating from my party in the last administration. We adhered to that principle. We believe in it today, and we believe that it is the proper way out of the depression. However, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation needs more than $850,000,000 if we are going to provide funds for working capital for legitimate industry at the present time.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry. I cannot yield. I would say to the gentleman that there is absolutely no way in which you can offer amendments under the drastic rules under which this legislation is being considered. You cannot do anything except to vote for the bill.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything in this bill that will permit the financing of industrial exports?

Mr. STEAGALL. Of course, the gentleman knows what is in the bill. This bill simply continues the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the existing law and furnishes them the additional money.

Mr. FISH. I understood the gentleman to state a few minutes ago—and I agree with him—that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has the authority to finance the exportation of agricultural products. The gentleman made that statement and I think that is entirely correct.

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman is in error. I did not refer to anything like that. I said that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had been authorized to finance the activities of the Department of Agriculture and to finance the marketing of farm products.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman think that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has no authority to go further and help the exportation of industrial products?

Mr. STEAGALL. I cannot answer the gentleman.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman must know. The gentleman is chairman of this important committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. I decline to answer that.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman declines to answer. That is the gentleman's privilege, but I want to call attention to the committee report, which reads as follows:

> The additional funds will also increase the funds available for the financing of agricultural and industrial exports.

That is the last sentence in the committee's report on this bill.

Mr. STEAGALL. Then that is satisfactory to the gentleman, is it not?

Mr. FISH. It is not at all satisfactory when the gentleman declines to answer and states that he does not know. Either the gentleman is right or the report is right.

As a new member of the committee, I hope the chairman of the committee will bring up an additional measure. This is merely an emergency measure continuing the R.F.C. for another year. I hope in the near future the whole R.F.C. matter will be brought up so that we can provide additional capital for industry, as well as take up the question of whether the R.F.C. has the right to loan money for industrial export purposes.

Mr. STEAGALL. The R.F.C. has the right under the original law to finance exports. I understand that there are certain limitations to that right. There is no right to finance foreign governments and there is no right to finance transactions abroad, but they are authorized to finance——

Mr. FISH. Agricultural products, but not industrial products?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. FISH. That is the question. I hope the bill will pass and that the gentleman will bring in amendments in the near future so that the whole matter can be brought up for consideration and debate. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I shall support this measure, as I have supported all the others that dealt with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I believe it to be an essential agency in our recovery program. However, I am disappointed that we have no opportunity to present amendments to make the Reconstruction Finance Corporation really serve the need in this time of stress.

I agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] that it is fundamental that industry have some way to secure the capital which has been depleted through the past 4 years of depression. There should be an opportunity here for us to offer an amendment providing that loans may be made directly to industrial concerns.

I have had many letters from worthy business men with 20, 25, and 30 years' successful record in industry. They have provided pay rolls; they have kept employees at work and have themselves stood losses continually. Now, after 4 years' courageous battle, they are helpless to secure the credit which they have a right to have on their records.

The President in his message today has told us of plans for stabilizing the value of the dollar. It must be done. While it is under way there is uncertainty and the banks and financial institutions of this country are not lending money. They will not lend money to industry until there is assurance as to the value of the dollars that will be returned in repayment of loans. If there is a risk, the Government must take it.

If this policy of fixing the value of the dollar is sound, and I believe it to be, then there will be no risk whatever in lending money to industries engaged in a legitimate business with sound assets and with a history of success and achievement behind them. It seems to me to be an obligation of the Government, under conditions as they are at this moment, to assume the responsibility of making loans direct to industry.

I have here a little publication describing credit extended to farmers under present laws. It explains that security for loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may be a mortgage lien on personal property, such as livestock, implements, and crops. Real-estate liens are acceptable only as secondary security. If we could have that provision written for industry, we would solve one of the mightiest problems that involves the very base of our economic system. These industries have chattels, they have assets, they have machinery, they have many kinds of security, but they are not acceptable for bank loans.

There should be an arrangement by which unfilled orders might be financed and by which accounts receivable might be given a valuation which would help maintain our industry.

What we have done, I am afraid, is to lend to banks, insurance companies, and other agencies at the very top of the pyramid, while we have left the great industrial base of the pyramid untouched.

I hope the Banking and Currency Committee will act upon the bills that have been introduced, among them my own, providing that we empower the R.F.C. to grant loans to industry. Industry is the great creator of jobs in this country, and by helping industry we can help restore the prosperity which we so greatly desire.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Under the provisions of this bill, are the bonds of the R.F.C. to be sold to the public?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I do not believe there is any provision in this bill for it. This is an extension of the powers of the R.F.C., based on the organic law itself.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. So the bonds will be sold to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is the case; yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, supplementing my inquiries of the leadership of the majority a little while ago, I should like to call attention further to the fact that during my 19 years of service in this body this is the first time the Speaker of the House has recognized anyone for the purpose of suspending the rules to pass a bill at such an early point in a session of the Congress.

I regret, and the Membership of the House should regret, that there is no opportunity to amend this bill.

The bill calls for an appropriation of the taxpayers' money of $850,000,000. The request of the head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been raised $350,000,000 by the other body, the Senate, and, in a rather flippant manner, the President of the United States approves of the expenditure of $350,000,000 more than the Reconstruction Finance Corporation had asked.

Another reason this bill should be properly discussed and amended is with respect to what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been doing with the more than $3,000,000,000 worth of money which has already been appropriated and made use of by them. I venture to say there is not a man in the House of Representatives who knows to what use this money has been put and whether or not it has been lent or used as designated by the original act.

In the question of loans to foreign governments it was generally understood when the act was originally passed a provision was put in which we understood would prohibit the use of this fund for financing foreigners. We now know that loans have been made directly to Russia. Last spring a loan of $4,000,000 was made to Russia and a loan anywhere from forty to fifty million dollars to China has been consummated. This making of a cash loan was camouflaged by a statement that we were exporting wheat and other agricultural products. I happen to know that in China they have a surplus of wheat and the agricultural interests in China are in the same position we are here in the United States, which leads me to believe that not a dollar's worth of wheat went to China, but a cash transaction was carried on which has a tendency to involve the United States in the Far East situation with Japan.

Another reason, we know now that in their purchase of preferred bank stock we are making good the losses the bank made on foreign loans. An instance is the purchase of preferred stock of the Chase National Bank of $50,000,000, and that $50,000,000 goes to pay losses on foreign loans, which will be charged off against losses made by the bank.

I want to say to the Membership that you will rue the day that you reported and passed this bill without the knowledge that the House is entitled to. There is not a thing presented to the Committee on Banking and Currency or this House that gives the financial condition of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

It has the making of a central bank, and here today you are taking another step in that direction. Is there any Member here who can answer these questions? If there is, I should like to have them answer. There are many more questions along this line upon which Members should have information but we are not permitted to have answered. We are to pass the bill under a gag rule—under suspension, which is a gag rule as bills are passed at this session. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, there are several gentlemen who have evidenced their general interest in the matter of direct loans or loans direct and indirect to industry.

Now, I want to say to these gentlemen and to the Committee generally that I believe that the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House, as is the general Membership of the House, are in favor of that policy.

It was considered at the committee hearings, but in view of the imminent need of continuing the life of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and in view of the fact that this bill does not extend the power of the Corporation, but merely the life, it was thought better if a bill was introduced and referred to the committee authorizing the proposed change in methods of making loans to industry, to consider that matter and other matters later.

We are appropriating billions of dollars in this country for relief, relief through public-works projects and relief through made work. I am in favor of that program, because it is necessary, as some one has said, to administer a drug, a shot in the arm, if you please, to keep the patient alive; but it is, of course, as we all realize, not a normal or wholesome condition. I believe in extending aid to industries, to small industries, to industries in the community that would employ perhaps only 50 or 100 or maybe 150 men, but which, so far as can be judged, have a future that is sound. I believe that policy should be facilitated. Of course, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation now is making a few loans to industries. The able chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Mr. Jones, when he appeared before our committee, was questioned upon that policy and this is partly in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. TRUAX. We asked him how much had been loaned industry. He said that naturally he did not have the exact figures with him but it was only a few million dollars. At present it is necessary if an industry wants to obtain a loan, and there is no mortgage loan company through which the loan can be made, under the regulations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, for three or more to organize either a mortgage loan corporation or some similar finance corporation, and for the loan to be made through that medium. Personally, and I am speaking only for myself, as one member of the committee, I am in favor of eliminating as much of the red tape as possible and of making loans direct to industry.

I think Mr. Jones, perhaps, might make the condition such that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has not the facilities for making the proper investigation, and that another corporation might have to be set up, or, as he would prefer, that we use some organization already set up to make the investigation to determine whether the loan, if made direct to industry, would be warranted. There was a very strong sentiment in the committee in favor of facilitating such loans, and I know the committee would be glad to consider such independent legislation.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. HEALEY. Do I understand that a mortgage-loan corporation may be organized for the purpose of just arranging for one loan to one particular industry?

Mr. SISSON. I do not so understand. Our information on that came from Mr. Jones, and I understood from him that the present method was that there must be at least three members, three incorporators, to incorporate a mortgage-loan corporation, for the purpose of acting as an intermediary through which the loan will be made. In other words, if the gentleman had an industry he would have to combine with two other industries, but not necessarily in the same locality.

Mr. HEALEY. But the mortgage-loan company would have to pledge its own independent assets and not the assets of the company that was seeking the loan?

Mr. SISSON. I should think that the security of both, in effect, would furnish the basis for a loan.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, it has been my pleasure and opportunity during last year to make some study of the ramifications and services rendered by the Re-Reconstruction Finance Corporation. During the summer and fall I had an opportunity on many occasions to go with my bank boards that were closed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some findings along this line.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. I think it appropriate to say this is a reconstructed Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The interpretation of the powers vested in this Corporation during the last 10 months have been somewhat broader than they were prior to this time. I trust the Banking and Currency Committee will give us a bill in the near future that will meet with many of the demands we have heard here on the floor from the various Members. The present powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation apparently do not allow them to reach down to the little fellow directly. There are many questions raised by our friends concerning the loans made to the mortgage companies. They wonder why they cannot be made to some little company that is about to be sold out because it cannot pay taxes, or raise enough to reduce a small mortgage. In many cases they are quite right and I believe that if the proper kind of bill along this line is brought out by the Banking and Currency Committee that it will not only receive the support of the Members of the House but it will be serving multiplied hundreds.

I am sure it will be of interest to all the Members to read the authorizations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as of March 5, 1933, to January 9, 1934, inclusive.

Mr. SNYDER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN].

Mr. MCSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I was gratified to hear the able and distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency state that that committee would give consideration to any proposed legislation by Members of the House other than members of the committee, as well as members of the committee, seeking to broaden the base of operations by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It has been gratifying to hear other members of the same committee state here today, as well as privately, that they sympathize very much with some such proposal.

I appeared before the Committee on Banking and Currency and proposed certain amendments to the pending bill then under consideration. The first amendment that I proposed was that the Corporation should have power to loan to any person, firm, or corporation offering adequate security and being able to show, in the second place, that by obtaining this loan it would be able to employ a larger number of persons, or would be able to show that unless it did obtain such a loan it would be compelled to curtail its operations and thereby reduce the number of persons employed. This suggestion of mine was in the interest of aiding the unemployment situation. In the next place I proposed as an amendment that there should be authority by the Corporation to loan to the owner of any business property, such as stores and factories and wholesale establishments, sufficient money to pay accrued taxes; and that the mortgage taken by the Finance Corporation to secure this money to advance sufficient money to pay up the accrued taxes should occupy the same priority status now held, under the laws of the several States and the subdivisions of the States, by tax liens, provided the States where the property was located would enact legislation to give such mortgage that particular priority status. The idea in that proposal is this: At present there is no relief for the owners of business property. The owners of homes can obtain relief through the Home Owners' Loan Corporation.

The owners of farm property also might have access to a hope of relief, but to the owner of business property there is absolutely no hope except through private banking and private financing institutions. That class of property owners has suffered also. Much of their property is completely idle. The rents on all of it have been reduced, and in some cases have been very considerably reduced. They must keep that property insured. I suspect that 75 percent of that property is under mortgage. Therefore the interest must be paid in order to prevent foreclosure. Consequently the owners of that property have been compelled to permit their taxes to get in arrears. They could make terms with the tax collector, but they could not make terms with the mortgage company; and there is a provision in the mortgage requiring the property to be kept insured, and so they insure the property. I know of some cases where the taxes are in arrears for 4 or 5 years. It is impossible, out of the current rent, to obtain sufficient money to pay the interest on the debt and the insurance premiums and also to pay this lump sum of accumulated unpaid taxes.

The purpose of that amendment was to give relief to them. If the bill had been considered under the ordinary rules of the House, I had proposed to offer today not only those amendments but a third amendment authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan money to any college, university, or institution of learning, upon adequate security, upon a showing by that institution that without obtaining such financial assistance through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation it would be compelled to curtail its services as an educational institution to the public.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] has expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in this connection by inserting the amendments that I propose, and to say that I intend to offer bills which will come before the Committee on Banking and Currency, seeking to effectuate these principles. I hope to have the cooperation of those gentlemen who have today expressed an interest in the various aspects of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield for a question.

Mr. RICH. I know the gentleman is very desirous of trying to assist colleges to obtain funds provided there is an opportunity to offer amendments. Does the gentleman think it is a mistake to bring in bills without giving the membership of the House the privilege of trying to offer amendments?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; I do not, for this reason: This legislation must be passed so that the life of the Corporation may be preserved. The other matters that I suggest are, perhaps, controversial. If we get tied up about controversial matters, the 22d of January may pass and the life of the Corporation expire. I am willing to go before the committee on the merits of this proposition which I have advanced and to bring them before the House under the general rules of the House. I am going to support the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill as it is.

Here are the amendments which I proposed to offer and for which I will introduce bills very soon:

That said Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to make loans to any person, firm, or corporation offering as security business property in any city or town, the limit of such loan to be sufficient to pay accrued property taxes upon such business property; and any mortgage or other equivalent lien taken by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for said purpose shall have the same priority of lien over existing liens or subsequent liens as is now enjoyed by the State and/or the political subdivision of the State where said property may be located to secure such accrued taxes, but these benefits and provisions shall avail only in such States as provide by suitable legislation to secure to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the priority of lien herein stipulated.

That said Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to make loans to any college, university, hospital, or other institution of learning or charity, that can and does offer adequate security for such loans, and can and does satisfy the board of directors of said Reconstruction Finance Corporation that such loan is necessary in order to enable said institution of learning to enlarge or expand its service to the public, or that without such loan such institution of learning will probably be compelled to curtail and reduce its service to the public.

That said Reconstruction Finance Corporation be and is hereby authorized and empowered to make loans to any person, firm, or corporation that can and does offer adequate security for such loans and can, in addition, satisfy the board of directors of the said Reconstruction Finance Corporation that by reason of making such loan the number of persons that shall be employed by any such person, firm, or corporation receiving such loan can and will be increased, or that by reason of the inability to obtain any such loan the number of persons employed by any such person, firm, or corporation so applying must and will be reduced.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] has again expired.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, like many other Members of the House, I had expected we would have an opportunity to suggest amendments to the bill. I am becoming somewhat philosophical at the constant repetition of denial of that opportunity as bills come before the House, and I have not risen to utter any very emphatic complaint about it.

This whole question of the recovery program, of course, is one of extraordinary interest. A great many suggestions are made for the relief of unemployment and the restoration of normal business conditions. As has been said today, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been employed as one of the more effective weapons in carrying out the program. There are some phases or elements of the program, viewed in the large, in which I have not had a great deal of confidence, especially expenditures of very, very large sums of money upon gigantic public works, in the hope that unemployment would be materially relieved. I fear that some of those who believe in that improvement program are too apt to view labor in the mass, and to visualize tens and tens of thousands of men employed on vast public works. Of course, many thousands will be employed when that work is finally organized and put into operation, but machinery and labor-saving devices as now developed and employed almost universally on these vast public projects are so extraordinary in their effectiveness that we see occasion after occasion upon which we are disappointed at the actual number of men employed, the machine accomplishing so much.

I am sure you and I have seen that in the laying of concrete roads. Word comes through a community that a new contract has been let for the building of a road 16 feet wide, of concrete, and that a great deal of employment will be offered, and we find that only 25 or 30 or 40 men are finally employed on the job. An examination of the difficulties and problems has led some people to believe that the employment relief program has not as yet filtered amongst the people themselves to a sufficient degree.

The recent rather desperate effort, known as the "Civil Works Administration program", has been put into effect. Of course, that gives employment to a great many people, but I do not think any of us would insist that that employment is being put to useful, permanent work. Many of them rake leaves and scoop out the ditches at the sides of the road. I know of cases where they are used to whitewash cow barns on the farms, on the ground that the whitwashing of a cow barn is in the interest of public health. I have had indications brought to my attention where Civil Works Administration workers might be used, if the farmers will supply the material, for the painting of the outside of his barn, or even for the undertiling of his land, so desperate are the attempts of the authorities to find useful work of a public nature.

That branch of industry generally known as the "building-construction trades or industry" is the one which is hardest hit, I believe, of any industry in the country. Practically all private building operations in the United States stopped about 4 years ago; and I think if you will examine the records of the labor unions whose members are devoted to the building trades, such as carpenters, masons, plumbers, steam fitters, electricians, painters, plasterers, and so forth, you will find that, generally speaking, in our industrial centers especially, not more than 10 or 15 percent of such artisans are today employed, despite the Government's programs of public works.

It has occurred to some of the members of that industry, not only the employers but the laboring people themselves, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could be of use. The suggestion which I am about to make, and which I intended to offer as an amendment to this bill had amendments been in order, may seem to many of you somewhat bizarre. I think it has not been made elsewhere in an official way. It does not emanate from me originally; it emanates from a group of builders, leaders of labor organizations, architects, and building-material supply companies who are very much distressed at the degree of unemployment in the building trades.

They contend, and I agree with the contention, that most of the cities and small towns of the United States today are overbuilt; they do not need new office buildings; they do not need new hotels or apartment houses; they scarcely need new residences. During the boom period nearly all of them overbuilt. The real-estate boom was as bad as the stock-market boom, with the results with which you are all familiar. But by the same token, Mr. Speaker, during these 4 years or more scarcely any repairs have been made upon existing buildings. Factory buildings, apartment houses and hotels, private residences, stores, shops, and mercantile buildings of one kind and another have gone without repairs until today thousands and thousands of them are shabby in the extreme. The owners of such buildings, residential or commercial in character, find it very difficult to secure loans through the normal banking channels for their repair, be the buildings houses, stores, apartments, or hotels. Were these owners enabled to secure credit in small amounts, loans of $500, $1,500, $2,000 to the average home owner, or shop owner, and in larger sums of course to the corporate or individual owner of larger buildings, to repaint, fix up the back porch, if you please, to repair the heating plant, to reshingle the roof; if these people were permitted, as the result of the extension of credit, to employ the local carpenter, the local painter, the electrician, the steam fitter, the plumber, the mason, it would distribute the means for reemployment down through the communities of this country and reach thousands and thousands of men in the building trades who today are unable to find anything to do.

I appreciate the suggestion has its difficulties. It would require a great dispersal of administrative activities. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation would have to select agencies in various regions of the country or create agencies, corporate or otherwise, to examine into this situation and ascertain if it is not possible to extend credit in this fashion so that literally thousands of men could be put to work, and useful work—not subsidized, not artificially created—with no burden upon the taxpayer as must be the case eventually with vast public works. These men will be put to work on projects which are actually needed today in every village, small city, and great industrial center in the country.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I am very much in sympathy with the general principles the gentleman suggests, but what sort of security would be offered? In nearly every case the Government would have to take a second or third mortgage, would it not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would not suggest that the Congress itself prescribe definitely and rigidly the method by which the Government might be secured. I will admit that there is a problem in that side of the undertaking.

I certainly would make it plain, however, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that no such loans should be made unless the owner of the property enjoys a sufficient equity to warrant it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is with the idea that members of the Committee on Banking and Currency give some consideration to this that I am imposing upon the patience of the House this afternoon. I do not pretend to say the thing is without difficulty. The suggestion arises, as I said, from the groups and interests which I have attempted to describe in the first part of my remarks. They are convinced that unemployment cannot be adequately relieved on the make-work principle; and they are likewise convinced that there exists all over this country many, many opportunities for employment of skilled artisans on work needed to be done. It is their hope, as well as mine, that the committee and any other Members of the House interested in this matter give some consideration to the suggestion.

I think I am not violating any confidence when I say that this suggestion has been taken up with Chairman Jones, of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Without committing himself to a final opinion upon it, he expressed sympathy with the suggestion. Indeed, he stated to some of us that the idea has been brought to the attention of their organization, and he suggests that we give it some study and consideration.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Has the gentleman an estimate of the number of unemployed trades people? I am particularly interested in this question myself because I have in my district a great many people employed in the building trades, and I know they are desperately in need of work. I have already asked the administration and the President to help them.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no such estimate, but the number is very large. The public-works program is not helping them much.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I think they should have gone on with the building of the Army camps and forts. This would have provided work for a great many men and would not cost the taxpayer any more than it will cost them eventually, because the forts must be completed sometime.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This proposal I have suggested will cost the Government only what it takes to administer it—very little.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman spoke of labor-saving machinery in the matter of road construction, pointing out that it put many men out of work. Does not the gentleman believe that if mass production were regulated it would give employment to a great many people, and that it should be regulated in order to give a satisfactory amount of employment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If we did away with automatic machinery for the purpose of creating employment, I do not believe the taxpayers could stand the cost.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I regret as much as any gentleman in the House that it has been thought necessary, on account of the exigencies of the situation, to bring this legislation in under suspension of the rules. I had hoped it would be considered under the general rules of the House with the freedom of offering amendments, and I had intended to offer at the close of the bill which you have before you this additional paragraph:

> The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and empowered, subject to the provisions of section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, to make loans direct to partnerships, corporations, and associations engaged in manufacture or processing or in the sale or distribution of manufactured or processed products. The amount of loans made under this provision shall not exceed $500,000,000 in the aggregate.

While I am disappointed in not having the opportunity to offer this amendment, I am consoled somewhat by the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SISSON] in regard to the favorable reaction in the Banking and Currency Committee to this suggestion. I hope that in subsequent hearings this proposition will be elaborated upon, and that the proposed legislation will be reported favorably and passed by this Congress.

The great immediate need of industry throughout the United States is working capital. That is shown by the wide-spread national interest manifested in the bill introduced by me on January 3 authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make direct loans to approved firms and corporations to provide them with working capital so they may employ men and women and start productive enterprises. Letters attesting the value of that proposal as an aid to business and industrial rehabilitation have come from many States and sections and the demand for liberalization of the Corporation's lending power along that line is spontaneous and insistent.

I fear that the mere addition of $850,000,000 to the funds to be expended under the existing law by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will not adequately meet the situation. There is a feeling that this money will not percolate through the circuitous route now provided in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation set-up to get where it belongs and where it will have to be if it is to start the wheels of industry.

"That additional allotment of $850,000,000 to be loaned through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation sounds big, but if you want Government money to start your factory or finance your business on an operating basis just go to your bank and try to get some of it", is the pointed comment that one hears on the bill reported by the Banking and Currency Committees of Congress, which merely make $850,000,000 more available to be loaned in the old way. There is, I think, a very proper feeling that the Federal Government has gone as far as can reasonably be expected in strengthening the reserves of banks and other financial institutions; that hereafter loans of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation must be more fluid if they are to be effective in the general interest, and must flow to the places where needed to furnish working capital for a general revival of the Nation's industries. This is said without any criticism, intended or implied, of the bankers. They naturally feel, in view of their trust relations, that in times of stress they should hold their banks in a condition of superliquidity, but it is the duty of the Government to shape its policy with a view to facilitating the earliest possible return to business and industrial normalcy.

Industry in this country is in the grip of a stalemate. The condition is tragic and pathetic. Factory furnaces are idle and factory chimneys are smokeless, while taxes eat the remaining substance of the owners, and capable and willing workmen go on the relief rolls to get bread for their families or tramp the streets hopelessly checkmated in their efforts to find work.

I hold it to be the paramount duty of the Congress to come to the aid of industry in these circumstances. I conceive it to be the duty of the Congress to help industry out of this stalemate, which it can do by authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to furnish direct loans on unimpeachable security to start the wheels going and put men at work. The plain and naked truth is that industry is starving for want of working capital. The industrial pump needs priming and the way to prime it is to furnish capital it so much needs to go ahead. Many a good solvent company in the city I have the honor to represent in this Congress, fortified with the very best security, has said to me: "If we could only get money for working capital, we would start operations immediately and help to reduce the army of unemployed, but we cannot borrow one cent."

Among many communications on this subject that have come to me from all over the country are three from Indiana, which, I think, graphically explain the need of direct loans to approved industries through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. The writers of these letters are practical men and they understand the conditions existing in their communities. One is from James M. Pierce, of Shelbyville, Ind., a great furniture-manufacturing center, which for 2 years has been prostrate under the blight of depression. Mr. Pierce is agent of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Shelbyville. He writes:

> I understand you are introducing a bill to make loans direct to manufacturers. This is very much needed here in Shelbyville. We have several plants that have a good stock of raw materials and are anxious to operate, but have not been able to get loans from our local banks. If direct loans could be made, I am sure it would be a great blessing to many of our people here. I just, today, talked to one of our largest furniture plants which had employed about 500 people in good times and has a good stock of raw material, and it could go right to work, employing a great number of people, if it could get a loan. Four or five other plants are in the same condition.

Gilbert H. Bosse, manufacturer, of Evansville, and one of Indiana's leading business men, writes:

> I understand you have introduced a bill in Congress to make it possible for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to come to the direct assistance of industry, and I wish to commend and urge that you give this legislation all the strength and power at your command. I feel that one of the best things you can do to maintain pay rolls and employment in the State of Indiana will be to bring about amendments to the law to make it possible for industry to go direct and get quick action.

The third letter to which I refer is from George M. Fries, of the old firm of A. Fries & Sons, of Connersville, Ind. He writes:

> I think you have laid your finger on the most vital proposition now facing the industrial world. For some time I have made a canvass of the plants in our line, trying to determine how many will be able to resume operations should business justify in doing so, and I find that almost 90 percent of plants cannot even get a start. These plants have been closed since 1929 or 1930; and taxes, insurance, interest, upkeep of plants, personal expenses, etc., have used up their ready money, and banks cannot help them.
> Take my own case: We closed in August 1929 and have not turned a wheel since. Our working capital was used up as stated above. Our old employees are now on the Public Works roll, and, as business shows some signs of getting better in our line, we should start our plant, reemploy our men, and take them off the charity list. This also calls for coal and other supplies that would be far-reaching. Also, under the code submitted to us, it will take 30 percent more working capital to operate in the future than in the past. Your bill is our only hope, and, should it fail to pass, thousands of good plants will never start again.

I think this last letter has a very ominous ring. "Thousands of plants will never start again" unless funds are provided by direct loans for working capital, is the opinion of this trained and seasoned business man.

The crying need of the times is some means to rehabilitate the business and industrial structure of the country—to start whistles blowing, smoke rolling, and wheels whirring. The industrial pump needs to be primed before it will work as in the happy days of the past. The best way to prime it is to provide for these direct loans on unchallenged security. Under this plan not one single cent will be donated out of the Federal Treasury to any industry, but the credit of the Government will be used in a sane and sound way to rehabilitate and revitalize the business and industry of the Nation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana yields back 1 minute.

Mr. LUCE. I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, everyone here seems to be enamored with the idea of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in spite of the fact that in the past 2 years it has been the subject of more political controversy than any other governmental agency, except, perhaps, the Agricultural Adjustment Agency. I have no criticism to make of the idea that is being advanced here today to make loans direct to an industry. The time has come, of course, when industry finds itself in the same situation that the farm and home owners are. That is, the credit sources are dried up completely, and there is no other place to turn except the United States Government for credit. Keep in mind, however, the fact that in 1930 we had a farm indebtedness in this country of over $9,000,000,000; in 1932, $8,500,000,000; and between May of last year and January 1 of this year the Farm Credit Administration made only 79,254 loans, totaling $210,565,000.

In other words, we have only scratched the surface; and that is likewise true of the loans under the Home Loan Act.

Today we talk glibly of loans to industry, not knowing that again we will be obliged to supply funds to the tune of millions and billions of dollars.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Does the gentleman know that banks today are not making loans to industry only because they do not want to go to R.F.C. and have it publicly known that they are borrowing from the R.F.C.?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I appreciate the fact that is one of the reasons the banks are not making loans and that the R.F.C. is not making loans to business.

Mr. KENNEY. Is that not an argument that the R.F.C. should make loans direct; that is, in cases where an application has been made to a bank for a loan and the bank, for some reason or other, does not want to become involved in the loan?

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman and I can agree on that subject. I am in favor of making loans directly to industry, because I believe you must of necessity provide a broad foundation for recovery, and that, quite naturally, the Public Works and the Civil Works programs, and I am for both programs, are just shots in the arm.

Let me say this in addition and in conclusion, that I am not speaking generally but specifically when I state to you some of the instances in my own district where we have small industries no longer able to finance themselves, and more especially to refinance themselves. It is to this type of industry that the R.F.C. can well direct its attention when a program of this kind is put into effect. I call specific attention to the fact that we must of necessity know upon what foundation we build the R.F.C. program for the financing and refinancing of private industry in this country. I am for it, and I hope the time will come when the committee will give it proper attention.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, we have heard the question of the extension for another year of the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation discussed and, for one, I am thoroughly in favor of granting the request of the committee. However, if at some future time it is the purpose of the House to take up amendments of the act or to recast the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's basic law, I hope we will not overlook the need of refinancing income properties.

The income-property owner of the country today is the one man who has had no consideration of any kind from Congress. As a matter of fact, under the present stress and strain of depression, there is no such thing as income property, because almost every owner of income property today is supporting that property by paying the interest on his loan and the taxes assessed against it. The returns, when he gets any, are not enough to carry the property. In many cases, the owners of so-called "income property" are carrying tenants in their rented property and getting no return at all.

Now, if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act could be so amended whereby income-property mortgages could be refinanced, many of our people would be saved from ruin. If additional loans were authorized to repair and modernize these properties, this would afford a vehicle for the employment of thousands of carpenters and plumbers and electricians and bricklayers and stone masons and concrete workers and every other class of craftsmen.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. That raises the same question I asked the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and it is a question that bothers me a good deal. Practically all of such buildings are subject to a mortgage, and how would the gentleman make the loan except as a junior lien, and would the gentleman want the United States Government to do that?

Mr. FORD. No; I do not think that would be necessary and I will tell the gentleman why. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation in lending money on such property, where the mortgage is not too high, would refinance the property and give the owner a sufficient amount of additional money, taking a first lien for the whole thing, to enable him to make the repairs and put the property in working order. I do not believe there is very much property in America today that carries second mortgages, because they have been wiped out.

Mr. PETTENGILL. If the gentleman will yield further, the total amount of mortgages on the homes in America is $20,000,000,000. If for the purpose of making the necessary repairs the Corporation would also take up the existing mortgages, the Corporation would at once get into an expenditure of more than $20,000,000,000.

Mr. FORD. If the existing indebtedness were of such a character that the income from the property would pay the interest and amortization on the loan what difference would it make? There would be ample security and the Government would get its money back in a period of years.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman has stated that practically all of the property he has in mind is non-income-yielding property.

Mr. FORD. That is because many of them are in such a bad state of repair that people will not pay sufficient rent to yield any net income; and also because many of the tenants are not paying any rent. But now that times are improving we are hopeful that rentals will come back. Then instead of having three or four families in one house each family will go into a separate unit and reestablish itself in the customary and normal way of living.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. FARLEY].

Mr. FARLEY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, we are asking in H.R. 6804 for authorization for the continuation of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I am very glad to be in full and hearty accord with the provisions of this bill. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation have been called upon to supply the funds and direction for rehabilitation of many harassed and embarrassed financial institutions. Without this Corporation progress from this depression would of all necessity have to be slow, and would take special legislation to offer needed and necessary relief. They have extended their arms in many directions. The railroad companies of America had been passing through a long series of unfortunate business relationship, many of them had been losing money, and most of them unable to finance their maturing indebtedness, and in some cases their operating expenses. In the loans which they have made to these corporations the transportation system of the Nation has gradually been moving forward to a better situation not only for the stockholders and bondholders, who supply much of the original capital, but also for the men employed by the hundreds of thousands in these transportation facilities.

Railroad companies are large buyers of steel and the other necessary products to build up their system and by enabling the railroad companies to get back into the market, increasingly larger numbers have been employed to produce the merchandise needed. It will be to the everlasting credit of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that they were able to step in at a time like this to restore confidence in their operations.

Banks of the country were likewise terribly crippled and assets were frozen by unwise loans. Recent investigations before the Senate Finance Committee have shown how unwisely some of the great banking institutions of the country have handled the affairs of their banks, in many cases to the detriment of both stockholders and depositors. Early in March when the bank moratorium was declared and the banks of the country closed, we first began to realize how far-reaching this calamity was. Had it not been for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to step in and make loans direct to banks to assist them at a time of great need, the result would have been a catastrophe.

Great banking institutions of America have done much in the development of our country and, under the spell of the boom days of 1929 and even previous to that time, reached too far in their financing program and needed this assistance. While there have been some unwise loans made, in the main, they have been of a constructive nature. There has likewise been criticism that some large banks received too generously from the corporation funds, yet we must realize that these banks had their correspondents throughout the entire Nation, and their funds loaned and the subsequent relief given reached out to even the smallest hamlet of the land.

I will not minimize the value of our banking system and its advantages to the people, but my desire is to see that banking institutions of America are thoroughly reestablished and perform the functions for which they were intended.

The reorganization and the purchase of preferred stock in banks by the Government itself has been of great benefit to the depositor, and I am of the impression that a better and sounder banking system has been created. Within a few years these loans will be repaid to the Corporation and the preferred stock which has been purchased by the Government will be redeemed by the banks.

I have several instances in my own district where this Corporation has stepped in and saved the communities from bankruptcy, and I would be the last one to curtail in any sense their activity.

I am voting for this measure, which carries with it an additional appropriation of $850,000,000, because I want the Corporation to have the funds and authority to release the hundreds of millions of dollars still tied up in the banks and aid the depositors' committees in getting back into circulation the money in these depressed centers. We have provided in former measures for direct loans to insurance companies. Life insurance companies have performed a useful service throughout many years, but never until the period of 1931 and 1932, did the people generally realize the financial bulwark that these institutions really are. Loans on policies direct to the holder saved many men in small businesses, saved many communities, and also many families from actual need. Life insurance companies will continue to remain a strong part of our financial system. I have recently been told by the president of one of the great companies that their loans are now being repaid and that people generally are feeling that this is a reserve in addition to their other property and a liquid reserve on which they can call from time to time. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has made it possible for many of these companies to meet their obligations and to continue in business. By their liberal charter, the Corporation has been able to reach out in many directions not indicated, and to supply needed capital.

My disappointment in this measure is that it does not provide for what I consider a very essential addition to the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, namely, direct loans to industry. Not long ago the President, in a radio address, said substantially this: "The future of the country depends on our ability to keep the small communities intact." Nearly anywhere in a small town is some form of manufacturing industry that has been able to weather the storm up to now, but needs assistance at the present time. Large corporations like the American Telephone & Telegraph, General Motors, and General Electric have no difficulty in borrowing from the banks all the money required to take care of their immediate requirements, but the banks throughout the country, in particular the smaller towns, have not yet been sufficiently resuscitated to take care of their local requirements, and a very great hardship has come upon them because of this.

I know of a case where a company that has always made money in its operations requires a small loan. They went to one of the large banks where they had previously been doing business, and attempted to secure a loan, and were told that they were not making loans of that character now, but that they could probably secure accommodations with a certain finance corporation. This finance corporation afterward had borrowed between six and seven millions of dollars from the banks and reloaned it in the above manner.

We all know that industry cannot stand 12- to 15-percent interest for its working capital and the result will be just holding on for a time and then passing out of the picture.

Small industry everywhere needs this assistance. This assistance should come because of the large number of men and women employed throughout the land in these factories. If these factories are not helped, and they should be helped now, ultimately their operations will be curtailed and the employees will join the ranks of the unemployed.

We are spending hundreds of millions of dollars for relief, yet we surround the opportunity for industry to get relief with so much red tape that it cannot be obtained. I know of no one thing that would be a greater stimulus to business generally than to extend relief to the right kind of manufacturing and distributing enterprises. To be certain, there are many industries that have passed the time when their obligations would be considered first class, and there must of necessity be a grading of these securities. The demand is very great for legislation of this character.

In the hearing before the committee one of the officials made the statement that they were waiting for Congress to say something about loans to industry, and I for one would like to register my approval of their submitting to us at a very early date a measure that will reach out to take care of this part of our present need.

We have a paradoxical situation by which a man running a manufacturing plant for a quarter of a century and, by no reason of his own, has gotten caught in the crash of the last 3 years, now needs a little assistance and yet he cannot borrow money even on his pay roll, because about the only securities the banks will now loan on are stocks listed on the New York Exchange or bonds that can be sold on a minute's notice, and the smaller industries have none.

I am making this appeal for industry employing from 100 to 250 men and women, who are not able to get relief. There should be added to this measure a provision that would authorize and empower the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan to business and industries in the same way that they have loaned to banks, railroads, and insurance companies. This would afford immediate relief, putting many men back in the employ of these factories, and reduce the call for help. I am the last one who would like to see the operations of this corporation curtailed. I would want to see them increased.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN].

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York is absolutely right when he tells us that the building industry is hard hit. If my recollection serves me right, about 63 percent of the building-trades people, or approximately 1,600,000, have been unemployed for sometime. Repairs on buildings should be provided for.

I also agree with the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina that something should be done for education. I have with me here the six-point program of the Federal Advisory Committee on Emergency Aid in Education, representing some 20 national organizations, of which the American Federation of Teachers is one. This six-point program is very brief, and, with the permission of the House, I would like to insert it in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

PROPOSED PROGRAM OF THE FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON EMERGENCY AID IN EDUCATION

The subcommittee recommends that the educational emergency be met, as far as Federal financial assistance is concerned, by six steps. These six measures should be urged as vigorously as possible. The sums recommended under each of these steps are tentative and should be revised in the light of the latest data available on the needs.

Step 1. The emergency problem of keeping all schools open during the school year 1933–34 should be met by a Federal appropriation of $50,000,000 to be allocated according to emergency needs in the several States. This sum may be provided in one of two ways:

(a) By a special provision in the Relief Act, or

(b) By a separate Federal appropriation.

In either case such appropriation shall be administered preferably by a board of which the United States Commissioner of Education shall be chairman and executive officer.

Step 2. In view of the fact that the inability of many communities adequately to maintain schools is certain to continue during the fiscal year 1934–35, a Federal emergency appropriation of $100,000,000 should be made available beginning July 1, 1934; this appropriation to be distributed in an objective manner, determined by a board of which the United States Commissioner of Education shall be chairman and executive officer, and based upon reasonable evidence of needs and resources.

Step 3. The instability of educational support even in the abler States and communities, due to the shrinkage of the ability of property to pay taxes during the depression, constitutes an aspect of the present emergency of such proportion as to endanger the effectiveness of the schools throughout the Nation. The fundamental relief which is necessary in order that public educational institutions may be adequately supported can be secured only through the adoption of measures which will relieve taxation on property. The situation is so critical in education that the people are justified in using the Federal taxing power to insure the normal operation of schools. Accordingly, it is recommended that a substantial sum from the Federal Treasury be distributed to the various States to assist them in meeting this phase of the emergency.

Numerous public services other than education are at present crippled by the inability of property to carry the burden of taxation now imposed upon it in most of the States. Every effort will be made to coordinate this measure for the emergency relief of education with measures proposed by representatives of other areas of government to meet the financial crisis resulting from the decreased taxpaying ability of property owners. The method of distribution should be decided in the light of a conference with other groups, representing other phases of government. In general, however, we favor the distribution of such funds on an objective basis to be stated in the law.

Step 4. Local funds should be released for school maintenance by:

(a) Refinancing school-district indebtedness or such municipal or county indebtedness as may have been incurred in behalf of schools.

(b) Providing Federal loans to school districts or to municipal or county corporations, where (in the case of the latter) the loan is to be used for educational purposes: Provided, That in both instances the loan shall rest on the security of delinquent taxes, frozen assets in closed banks, or other acceptable securities.

Step 5. Out of any new appropriations made for Public Works not less than 10 percent should be allocated for buildings for schools, colleges, and other educational enterprises. Such grants shall be available provided that an approved survey has been made, and that the survey shows the need for the buildings. In cases where such surveys have not already been made these surveys shall be made under the direction of the Office of Education through a decentralized regional organization. The cost of these surveys shall be charged to the Public Works appropriation for school plants. We recommend that the grants for such projects be made on a 100-percent basis as was done in the case of roads in the original P.W.A. and for repairs and improvements under the C.W.A. In administering this fund major attention should be given to the needs of the rural schools by allocating a major portion of the grant to rural areas.

Step 6. A Federal appropriation of $30,000,000 should be provided to assist students to attend institutions of higher education for the period ending July 1, 1935. This fund should be administered by the United States Office of Education.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I also call attention to a pamphlet issued through the Superintendent of Documents by the Department of the Interior entitled "The Deepening Crisis in Education", leaflet no. 44, in which appears the astounding figure of 2,280,000 children who are of school age and ought to be in school but who are not provided for in normal times, which number is greatly exceeded now. Nothing is more important than the safeguarding of our schools. We who are here now are not going to be on the stage so very much longer. Someone else must carry on when we are gone, and these school children must be educated. I am opposed to demobilizing education in America and destroying our schools. I am opposed to sacrificing our school teachers at this time when we are so free with foreign loans to finance countries and empires beyond the seas and practically without regulation.

It is time to take care of the American schools in our own land. Conditions are daily growing worse.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I yield.

Mr. KENNEY. Is the gentleman in favor of a lottery of some kind?

Mr. LUNDEEN. I would not want to pass on that question now. The gentleman from New Jersey spoke on it the other day, and I shall want to read his remarks on that subject. I heard a portion of them. I wish that Members of this House would read and look into this pamphlet issued by the Department of the Interior on "the crisis in education." It has some astounding figures on schools and teachers' salaries and the aid which is needed for students, high schools, colleges, and primary schools. Commissioner of Education George F. Zook, states that this year, more than at any time in our recent history, the quality and even the existence of schools in many communities is at stake; that there are very few parts of the country in which schools, for want of funds, have not been compelled to shorten the school term; and that we find ourselves in the grip of a social difficulty from which we shall extricate ourselves only with great effort and pain.

CASUALTIES OF THE CRISIS

Here are the casualties which the Commissioner of Education summarizes:

One hundred thousand more children are being denied the benefits of education this year because of closed schools.

Another million children have been put on a "level of mental starvation" because of shortened school terms.

One half of the American cities have dropped some important school service.

One third of the teachers receive less than the minimum wage provided by the blanket code for unskilled labor.

Although a million more pupils have entered schools, 25,000 more teachers have joined the ranks of the unemployed. A total of 200,000 certificated teachers are unemployed.

Two hundred and fifty-nine school districts have defaulted on bonds.

The number of pupils per teacher is being increased, 40 pupils per teacher being the average in 5 States.

Even in normal times more than 1,650,000 children, 6 to 13 years old, are not in school; and 521,000 children, 14 and 15 years old, are not in school, making a total of 2,280,000 children of school age who are not in school. But add to that the children deprived of schooling simply because 2,000 rural schools in 24 States failed to open this fall, because 24 Catholic schools, 16 institutions of higher education, and 1,500 commercial schools and colleges have closed. Free public schools have become tuition schools. Commissioner Zook tells of one town of 15,000 population in which grade-school tuition was reported as $3 per child per month; high school tuition, $5.50 per month; and he states that in this town at least 200 children whose parents could not pay the tuition charges were being denied an education.

The press reports, on January 10, 1934, that the 1,100 pupils of Mayfield, Pa., have not been to school for 2 weeks because their unpaid teachers have struck. One of every four cities has shortened its school term, and 715 rural schools are expected to run less than 3 months this year, says Commissioner Zook, in spite of the fact that even in 1930 rural schools for 1,500,000 children were open not longer than 6 months. The same thing is true in the cities, where terms have been shortened to 1 or 2 months less than the school terms of a hundred years ago.

SOAK THE TEACHERS

"Soak the Teachers" is the title of an illuminating article in Plain Talk Magazine for November 1933, in which the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Economy League are fearlessly blasted for their selfish and shortsighted attack on the schools and school teachers of America. The infinitesimal saving affected by slashing teachers' salaries is shown by the statement made in this article that the entire cost of running schools—teachers' salaries, buildings, and everything—amounts to only 2.97 percent of the entire national income. Loren C. Palmer in this article further points out that the United States Chamber of Commerce apparently overlooks the fact that only 3 cents out of every dollar of income is spent for maintaining the entire school system, that the United States pays less taxes in proportion to national income than any other civilized country, that teachers' salaries are lower than those paid other gainfully employed people, and that effective public education is an investment of vital concern in national welfare.

Commissioner Zook states that 1 of every 4 American teachers is now receiving less than $750 per year and predicts that during this year 1 out of every 3 teachers will receive $750 per year for expert services. More than 84,000 rural teachers will receive less than $450 per year, he states, and 1 of every 13 Negro teachers will receive $25 a month or less. The warrants by which teachers in 18 States are being paid are subject to a cash discount of at least 5 percent. In Nebraska salaries have been reduced 40 percent, in Arizona 20 to 40 percent, in Tennessee 25 percent, says the Commissioner of Education.

SCOPE OF EDUCATION NARROWED

Since 1930 in about 700 cities, the Commissioner of Education reports that 67 reduced art instruction, 36 eliminated it; 110 reduced the music program, 29 eliminated it; 81 reduced the physical-education work, 28 eliminated it; 65 reduced home-economics work, 19 eliminated it; 58 reduced industrial-art instruction, 24 eliminated it; 89 reduced health service, 22 eliminated it.

STEALING PENNIES FROM CHILDREN

Jessie Gray, president of the National Education Association, charges those who are causing such demobilization of the schools with "stealing pennies from children." When the number of school children has increased by more than 1,000,000 pupils since 1930 and the current expenses have decreased about $368,000,000, it is inevitable that educational facilities are being curtailed rather than expanded. Three years ago, says the Commissioner of Education, the United States spent $10,600,000 per school day to teach 25,600,000 children; in 1933 we spent $8,500,000 per school day to teach a larger number of children—a decrease of $2,100,000 per day, or about 20 percent.

MORE PUPILS—FEWER TEACHERS

In order to allow the same number of pupils per teacher as we had in 1930, we would have to hire more than 26,000 additional teachers; and if the 2,280,000 children 6 to 15 years of age now not in school are to be educated, we must hire 76,000 more teachers. In short, concludes the Commissioner, if we are going to educate all American children of school age, give them the minimum essentials of modern education, we would have to employ 100,000 more teachers, or half of all certificated teachers now unemployed.

UNPAID WARRANTS

When no cash is available for school teachers, they accept interest-bearing warrants, and they now hold $40,000,000 in unpaid warrants. The lack of funds is explained by Commissioner Zook by top-heavy mortgages, tax delinquencies, tax limitations, closed banks, lower assessments, and differences in wealth between one State and another. But whatever the cause, it can be remedied by exposing and rejecting the unsound so-called "economy" recommendations of those who wish to escape their just burden of income taxes. James H. Richmond, Kentucky superintendent of public education and chairman of the National Committee for Federal Emergency Aid to Education, declares that only through liberal Federal aid can the Nation's schools be rescued from unsanitary and unsafe buildings and over-crowded conditions.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES SAVE THEIR SCHOOLS

Reports have been received by the Office of Education from several foreign countries, among them being Mexico, Australia, England, and Wales, the Irish Free State, New Zealand, Chile, Belgium, Bulgaria, Albania, Denmark, France, Greece, Italy, Latvia, Luxemberg, Switzerland, and South Africa, each one of which stated that in spite of all dire effects of the long depression and panic in these countries, the educational system had been safeguarded and preserved.

EDUCATION MUST BE EXPANDED

Secretary Ickes states that the most important question of all, in these days of pressing problems, is, What are we going to do about our schools? Dr. Glenn Frank, president of the University of Wisconsin, stated in his address before the convention of the National Education Association in Chicago last summer that economic recovery will prove a barren achievement unless the minds of the children of this Nation are safeguarded during the crisis. Only by fostering the growth of unshackled minds can we evolve an intelligently planned national economy from the chaos into which this country was recently plunged. We cannot economize by narrowing the scope of education, by crowding our children into unsafe and overcrowded buildings, or by slashing the salaries of teachers, who are already underpaid. There is nothing economical about a procedure of this kind. There is no rehabilitation as important as the rehabilitation of youth, of schools. More than ever before we need intelligent leadership. We must expand our educational facilities until we have wiped out all traces of that modern form of bondage which enslaves the minds of men to their undoing.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, in the course of the critical period through which we have been passing, two Presidents of the United States have seen fit to call into conference at the White House leaders of the majority and minority of the House and Senate and members of the House and Senate committees concerned with the particular issue that was laid before them.

As one of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency, it was my fortune to attend such a meeting in the early part of October 1931, summoned by President Hoover, and last night it was my fortune to attend another such meeting, summoned by President Roosevelt.

In view of the fact that emergencies justify and demand at times deviation from the spirit of the Constitution, I pass no word of criticism on either President for laying his views thus before representatives of the legislative branch.

It is my own hope, however, that this emergency will not have implanted upon the interpretation of the Constitution the practice in normal times of such communication between the Executive and the legislative branch.

At the first of these conferences President Hoover laid before those who gathered there the dire extremity in which the country stood. We were told that inside of 2 weeks every bank in the land might close its doors and unless there was quick and united action a calamity of the worst sort would afflict our land.

In response to the alarming need those present from both branches of the Legislature and from both political parties unanimously approved the program of President Hoover.

That program contained four proposals. I need address myself to but two of them. They are referred to indirectly in the report of your committee on the pending bill. One of them related to the misfortune of depositors in closed banks.

When we left the White House on that fateful evening, every man there had by spoken word pledged his loyal support or by silence given tacit approval to the program of the President. Today and here, 2 years and 3 months later, we find the party that then controlled the House and now is in full power admitting it has failed to keep the pledge in the matter of closed banks, admitting there must be more action.

All through that session whenever opportunity offered, speaking as a member of the committee concerned, I asked that the promise be kept. I asked that there be relief for the thousands—aye, the tens of thousands—of depositors in closed banks throughout the land, but we could not even get a hearing before the committee. We got no action from the committee. Nothing was done to carry out the pledge of that fateful evening in October.

And now, I repeat, 2 years and 3 months later, the administration comes before us with a request for more opportunity to keep a promise that ought to have been kept 2 years ago.

Mr. Speaker, of the other proposals of that evening, one concerned putting into action the idea that had proved so useful in the war period, that of the War Finance Corporation, a lending agency. President Hoover asked a revival of that idea, first, by a temporary organization, to be followed with a permanent organization. We promised unitedly, without partisanship, to support that idea, and I congratulate my Democratic friends for having kept that promise. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation was the child of President Hoover. It was the chief achievement in his administration.

Mr. Speaker, there are men who are going up and down the country telling a deluded people that the Republican Party did nothing to relieve this crisis, that President Hoover failed in any constructive action, or saying that those in the House and Senate who had opportunity to act did nothing. Why, the one notably successful thing, the one importantly helpful thing in all this crisis, has been that one, the child of President Hoover's imagination. In my judgment, practically everything else that has been done since the Democratic Party came into control has militated against the one essential for recovery, namely, a restoration of confidence. No matter how laudable the reforms that have been put into action, no matter how excellent the contemplated results, the one important effect has been to delay industrial activity, to delay the production of goods that are made for long-time use. Furthermore, the results have been to discourage every man in the land accustomed and willing to plan and to push; and if the wheels of factories are silent today, if tens of thousands of industrial employees are still out of work, if the dole has become necessary, it is because gentlemen have forgotten here and at the other end of the Avenue that the first thing to be done was to encourage production, the first thing to be done was to assure the leaders of the industrial life of the country that they could safely make contracts.

During this period the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a product of Republican conception, in executing which both parties joined, has functioned so as to do credit to both parties, first under a Republican administration and now under a Democratic administration. It has carried out its purpose of lending money. I do not agree with the strictures passed upon it by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] in his recent remarks. I do not agree with the insinuations of the press. I do not agree with the charges of the opposition that there was during the Republican years some knavery in some of its operations. I know there are those who confuse the public by pointing out the magnitude of some of these loans, and who have asked, particularly in the Chicago case, that censure be passed because of the size of the help given.

The number of millions lent has led the credulous to feel there was something wrong in that transaction. Great heavens, do they not know that loan saved Chicago and all the surrounding territories for miles and miles from the greatest financial disaster imaginable, a disaster more costly than the Chicago fire, more costly than any commercial calamity that ever was known? It was the size of that loan which saved the day.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. The gentleman knows that when that loan of $90,000,000 was made, Mr. Jesse Jones, the present head of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, sat in the conference room at Chicago and approved the entire transaction.

Mr. LUCE. I am glad the gentleman has made a record of that, for I would acknowledge the judgment, the sound common sense of the present Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, Mr. Jesse Jones, and I am grateful to the Democratic Party for having produced such an honest, upright, capable man to conduct this huge enterprise. I deplore criticism of it, and I repeat my recognition of the fact that this is the one undertaking of the Government that has fully stood the test, that has already made good.

Mr. BRITTEN. And I am satisfied from conversations that I had with President Hoover himself 2 days before the loan was made that he and other heads of the Government who were dealing with that loan, including the distinguished Mr. Jesse Jones, whom I regard just as highly as does the gentleman, undoubtedly were convinced that if the Dawes bank was not saved, banks in Detroit, Milwaukee, St. Louis, Indianapolis—all the banks in that region—would have been swept right off their feet by that terrible disaster.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I started by pointing out that I have attended two important conferences. History will record that of last evening as of hardly less significance than the one in October of 2 years ago, but in such time as remains I would point out a contrast. The Republican Party, under the leadership of President Hoover, committed itself to a policy of lending. The War Finance Corporation had been a financial success. As I recall, it had made a profit. It cost the taxpayer nothing. President Hoover suggested, proposed, and urged that the same principle be used in the present juncture. The Democratic policy, instead of being one of lending, has been for the most part one of spending—a vital difference. Lending in a crisis costs the taxpayer nothing and yet does infinite good to all concerned. Spending costs the taxpayer everything and does infinite harm to all concerned.

The ill effects of the spending process will be felt in this country for many years. The ill effects of the lending process, if it has any unfortunate effect at all, will be soon wiped out by the repayment of the loans.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I have but a few moments left. I would rather not yield now.

Last night there was laid before us a proposal embodied in the message today, that we supply the Government with more money for spending. The result of carrying out the proposals in this message will be to put at the command of the Government of the United States an amount somewhere between $3,400,000,000 and $4,000,000,000, according as the dollar is decreased to 60 or 50 cents. Certainly, these gentlemen ought to pause before they continue this mad orgy of giving away the money of the people, of spending it, much of it on fruitless labors, of wasting much of it without tangible results.

Already the volume of money that has been spent keeps in suspense, fills with fear, alarms and confuses the financial men of the land. Already other men are asking each other on the quiet, "where can I put a thousand dollars so that it will be safe?" Within an hour a fellow Member has taken up that subject with me. It is the common topic of conversation. "Where can what I have saved against the needs of sickness and old age be put so that I may be protected when later years come, so that my children may be protected?" That is the cry spreading among the people, through fear of this enormous debt, fear that the added expenditure of other billions of money will still further endanger the savings of the people.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. I have but 3 minutes remaining. I cannot yield.

So you may ask today, in passing judgment upon more money for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, whether you are not doing more wisely to return to the policy of President Hoover and the Republican administration, when you say that such further outlay as is incurred will be based upon obligations bringing security; that the money will not have to be paid by the taxpayers; that it will be returned to the Treasury; and that nothing but benefit will come. Because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has been clean, because its work has been effective, because more than any other one device it has helped save the day, I trust the passage of this bill will not have a single negative vote.

Gentlemen desire the activities of the corporation broadened. Many in the committee sympathize with that idea.

We did not think it pertinent to incorporate in this bill anything of the sort that has been here urged this afternoon. It may be considered later, and considered sympathetically. At the moment there is no occasion to elaborate on the difficulties. I would assure the House, however, that its Committee on Banking and Currency, Republicans and Democrats alike, have at heart the relief of the people wherever it can be done prudently and wisely, for the future as well as for the present benefit. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] has 3½ minutes remaining.

Does the gentleman care to use any further time?

Mr. STEAGALL. No, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFADDEN), there were ayes 186 and noes 1.

So, two thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table S. 2125, an act to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes, which is an identical bill to the one which just passed the House, and pass the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That until February 1, 1935, or such earlier date as the President may fix by proclamation, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized to continue to perform all functions which it is authorized to perform under existing law, and the liquidation and winding up of its affairs as provided for by section 13 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, are hereby postponed during the period that the functions of the Corporation are continued pursuant to this act.

SEC. 2. No funds shall be disbursed on any commitment or agreement to make a loan or advance hereafter made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation after the expiration of 1 year from the date of such commitment or agreement; but within the period of such 1-year limitation no provision of law terminating any of the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be construed to prohibit disbursement of funds on prior commitments or agreements to make loans or advances.

SEC. 3. The amount of notes, debentures, and bonds or other such obligations which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to have outstanding at any one time pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended, is hereby increased by $850,000,000.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which the bill H.R. 6804, an act to continue the functions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to provide additional funds for the Corporation, and for other purposes, was passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The bill H.R. 6804 will lie on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JED JOHNSON (at the request of Mr. SWANK), on account of the death of his mother.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I had expected the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to call up the bill relating to farm loans today.

Mr. JONES. We intend to call that up tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that will be the program for tomorrow, the bill from the Committee on Agriculture, which was spoken about before?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes; and if we get through with that, we will take up an appropriation bill.

TO AID EDUCATION

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, on January 4, 1934, I introduced H.R. 6367, which is a bill entitled "A bill to promote education." The bill is very short and comprehensive.

As everyone knows, during this time of depression the educational interests of our country have been hit as hard as anything else, and it has been very difficult for school teachers to maintain themselves on account of a reduced revenue, caused largely by the depression.

Many school districts have employed teachers and issued warrants that cannot now be cashed in the counties where they were issued on account of the lack of funds.

Section 1 of my bill provides as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all teachers' warrants regularly issued between January 1, 1933, and January 1, 1934, for services actually rendered in teaching in the public schools of the United States, are hereby declared to be eligible paper for a loan from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Section 2 of the bill provides as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is hereby authorized and directed to accept at their full face value for a loan all teachers' warrants regularly issued and due for teachers' salary in the United States from January 1, 1933, to January 1, 1934.

Section 4 of the bill provides that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may set up or designate such agency in each State as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

The rate of interest or discount on loans as provided by this bill shall not exceed 3 percent. I do not think that the rate should exceed half that amount.

There has been much favorable comment on this bill since its introduction.

It is a known fact that many schools, especially in my State, the State of Arkansas, have been closed on account of the inability of teachers to cash their warrants after performing services.

If schools are carried on, teachers must be paid. We cannot think about depriving the children that are growing up now to young manhood and young womanhood, of an education. This will help promote education and will not be a penny's cost to the districts that are trying to maintain schools. It will enable teachers to cash their warrants and go on with their profession of teaching.

I know of no reasonable objection that can be offered to a bill of this character, and I am hoping to see it enacted into law soon. The bill was referred to the Banking and Currency Committee, and anyone having an interest in the bill might communicate same to this committee.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on the subject of the report of the Shannon committee on Government competition in private business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. PETTENGILL]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, that the President is not pleased with everything done by everybody in the administration is proved by the fact that he fires a subordinate every now and then. And with a candor and honesty that captured the confidence of the Nation he himself has stated that he wants constructive suggestions as to how his program is working.

In addition he said at Atlanta in the spring of 1932:

We may build more factories, but the fact remains that we have enough now to supply our domestic needs, and more, if they are used.

The American people are willing to invest a huge sum as the price of recovery. This is war, and war costs money.

Nevertheless every effort should be made to spend for recovery usefully and not wastefully, or worse, destructively.

The Public Works Administration has just allotted $525,000 to construct a factory. Press release no. 419, issued by the P.W.A., is as follows:

An allotment of $525,000 to the Post Office Department for the construction and equipment of a manufacturing plant at Reedsville, W.Va., was announced today by the Public Works Administration.

The plant will manufacture lock boxes, furniture, and other equipment for use by the Department, and in its construction maintenance workers from the Reedsville Subsistence Homestead Unit will be used as largely as possible.

It is estimated that approximately 2,000 man-months of employment will be created by the construction and building and that at least 150 men will be given permanent jobs when the plan is in operation.

This factory when built will compete with the Keyless Lock Co., of Indianapolis, an old-established business, normally employing 250 men, and other factories in other American cities.

Two questions arise: First, are existing factories manufacturing post-office equipment incapable of producing the requirements of the Post Office Department? And, second, can the Government manufacture more cheaply than private industry?

I will come to the second question later; but assuming that "we have enough (factories) now to supply our domestic needs, and more, if they are used", then these questions arise:

What is the use of building a new factory to displace one already in existence?

What do you gain by employing 150 men in the new factory in West Virginia if, as a result, you throw out of employment 150 men in Indianapolis and elsewhere?

Do you not only not increase total permanent employment but also freeze $525,000 in superfluous buildings—money that might be otherwise used to keep people from starving? Do you not simply transfer unemployment from one State to another and spend $525,000 to do so?

If the Government wants to go into the business of making lock boxes, why does it not buy a factory that is already built?

Again, is it fair to tax the Keyless Lock Co. and build a plant that will compete with and perhaps destroy it? If destroyed, the Government has simply increased the tax load and decreased the tax base to support that load.

Again, is a factory a "public work"? The statute creating the Public Works Administration authorized a "program of public works." It did not, in my judgment, authorize the erection of factories owned and operated by the Federal Government. If I am right this allocation violates the spirit if not the law which created the Public Works Administration.

For myself, I should much prefer to use this $525,000 either in useful public works, or as a loan of working capital to private industry which is not able to obtain credit on account of banking conditions.

Do we not all recognize, as stated by the President in his Budget message, that we cannot safely continue to incur huge deficits in necessary emergency employment under the Public Works Administration and Civil Works Administration, after next year, without possibly impairing the credit of the Government, and that the big problem facing us is the ability of private industry to reabsorb these millions of men as public work is gradually tapered off?

I have never talked with anyone representing the Keyless Lock Co. It is not even a constituent. I use this company only as an example of a tendency that in my judgment requires examination and further authorization by the American people if Government is to take over private enterprise. Beware of small beginnings.

The sins of certain leaders of private industry in many lines are indeed serious, especially in the field of finance. I have no defence for the Harrimans and Insulls, who have bled this Nation white. With respect to them, if I were to spend Federal money, it would be to build prisons.

But certainly it cannot be contended that a little factory employing 250 breadwinners is a public enemy that should be crushed, or even interfered with, by the strong arm of the Federal Government. Whether the factory employs 250 or 25,000 bread winners makes no difference if it is operated with a social conscience.

Is it not true that one of the evil things of the past decade was that the dollar got too big a share of total income and the man got too little, and that the surplus earnings of the dollar were invested and reinvested in more and more buildings and plant equipment and thus became frozen and lost to the Nation, whereas if those earnings had gone more largely into increased wages or unemployment or old-age reserves they would have remained more liquid and serviceable in lean times? You cannot eat buildings.

This factory is not the only victim. The process has been going on for many years and especially in the last 12 years.

The Shannon committee, in its investigation last year of Government competition with private enterprise, heard witnesses representing 225 lines of industrial activities who complained of competition by their own Government which taxed them to finance its competition with them. This testimony covering 37 typewritten volumes is summarized in the report of that committee filed February 8, 1933, under House Resolution 235.

The next question is whether the Government can manufacture post-office equipment, for example, cheaper than its own citizens. I do not think anyone knows whether it can or not. If it can manufacture supplies for its own use cheaper than it can buy them from its citizens, then, perhaps, in the interest of keeping the cost of government at the minimum, no serious objection can be made. But can it manufacture cheaper? That is the vital question. It remains unanswered.

Private industry contended before our committee last year that it can underbid Government manufacture, can pay equally fair wage scales, and do at a profit what Government does at a loss. It claims that it can do so on account of greater efficiency and initiative as against Government conduct of business in which the political angle seems always to enter.

Private industry says it can demonstrate its contention if Government activities were submitted to a proper analysis of cost accounting. At the present time, for want of such analysis, there are many actual but hidden costs, such as amortization of principal investment, interest, insurance, and so forth, which do not come to light in Government production costs. Because they do not come to light Government officials often contend they can manufacture cheaper than they can buy from private industry.

Our committee felt that this goes to the very heart of the whole question of Government competition with private industry. It therefore recommended in its report to which I have referred as follows:

The committee recommends that the Government departments and agencies be required by the Congress to install and maintain a uniform system of accounting, containing all the elements of cost finding, which the best practice has sanctioned for public utilities and private industrial and commercial enterprises. The committee believes that the results of such a system of accounting would be invaluable to Congress in considering appropriations for public works and similar projects, as well as in considering proposals for the continuance and maintenance of existing Government departmental, industrial, and business activities, and in passing upon new undertakings which may be submitted for congressional action. The establishment of such governmental accounting methods will also make possible a comparison between public and private costs of production and of service.

It should be said that this was only one of 29 recommendations by our committee. It is, however, the most important one.

That our committee was not interested in enhancing the profits of private industry at the expense of the workers is demonstrated by the further recommendations on page 20 of the report with relation to decent working conditions, hours of labor, and rates of pay on all Government work which might be let to private industry. We further anticipated the N.R.A. by stating:

No contract shall be let to any organization, plant, or establishment, in which it is made a condition of employment that the workers engaged therein shall not belong to, or remain or become a member of, a labor organization, or in which workers shall be denied the right to bargain collectively, should they choose to do so, through representatives selected by them.

And we concluded this part of our report with these words which we make bold to think are a star by which we should steer our course for the long future:

The committee believes that the Government, as the largest purchaser of goods in the Nation, should not sacrifice the welfare of workers to the sole consideration of economy. On the contrary we feel that the Government has a distinct obligation to set standards which shall maintain and even improve the ability of workers to buy the products of a mechanized civilization.

Returning to the question of ascertaining actual costs of government in business our committee unanimously reported a bill, H.R. 6038, copy of which I attach. I hope it will be read and constructive criticism made of it.

The question is, Can government for its own use actually carry on manufacturing and distribution cheaper than its citizens? If it can, let Uncle Sam do it. If it cannot, let John Citizen do it and derive a profit by which he can pay taxes to support government.

I have submitted these remarks to my colleagues on the committee now in Congress, Messrs. SHANNON, of Missouri; RICH, of Pennsylvania; and COX, of Georgia; and am authorized to say that they concur in the views here expressed.

We invite the attention of Congress and the Nation to this question, which is of vital importance in every congressional district.

The bill which we report is as follows:

A bill to provide for the establishment and maintenance of a standard system of cost accounting and cost reports for the executive departments of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That every executive department, independent establishment, office, and bureau of the United States shall establish and maintain a standard, uniform system of accounting and cost finding which will disclose the cost of each and all of the factors entering into and forming part of the cost of any manufacturing, construction, reconstruction, or repair operation undertaken by any executive department, independent establishment, office, or bureau or any agency controlled by them or any other agency of the Government which may now or hereafter be engaged in the above operation, regardless of the appropriation to which any or all of them may be chargeable.

SEC. 2. Every system of accounting aforesaid shall contain the following defined elements:

The element of "cost", by which is meant the cost of all direct labor, cost of all direct materials, all direct expenses, all overhead expenses, and interest on investment in property, equipment, and facilities used in or pertaining to the operations coming within the scope of this act.

The term "direct labor" means salaries, wages, or other compensation paid for labor directly performed upon the work undertaken or upon the component parts of the articles or things produced.

The term "direct material" means the cost of raw materials and purchased component parts entering directly into the work undertaken or into the articles or things produced, including, where specifications call for special packages and containers, the cost of such packages and containers. The cost of direct materials will be the invoice cost less any trade or quantity discount, plus duty and import expenses, freight, express, and drayage.

The term "direct expenses" means expenses of whatever nature directly appertaining to the work undertaken or to the articles or things produced, such as traveling and other field expenses occasioned by and solely in connection with a specific project; professional services, engineering, plans, and drawings for a specific project.

The term "overhead expenses" means—

(a) Expenditures applicable to and necessary in connection with any work or operation undertaken or any article or thing produced, and not properly chargeable to "direct labor", "direct material", or "direct expenses", and which are allocable to two or more simultaneous or successive projects within an accounting period, including supervision, indirect labor (such as factory trucking, cleaning, inspection, and other labor, the cost of which is not included in other overhead items); supplies (such as oils, waste, cleaning, hardening, tempering, and grinding supplies); fuel used, other than in the production of light, heat, and power; small tools (such as drills, files, reamers, and saw blades); water; repairs to buildings, machinery, and equipment; insurance; depreciation and obsolescence of plant and equipment; light, heat, and power, including fuel and power-house wages; engineering, plans, and drawings; factory management and general plant expense (such as telephone, stationery, purchasing department, cost and time-keeping departments, safety work, fire prevention, sanitary supplies); and property taxes: Provided, That the foregoing enumeration of specific items and advisory illustrations shall not be held to exclude such other items as are properly chargeable to overhead expense in accordance with prevailing and generally accepted accounting practice in private industry.

(b) A pro rata share of every administrative expense of every executive department, independent establishment, bureau, office, and all and every agency under their control or direction involved in any work or operation undertaken by them or any article or thing produced. Such administrative expense shall include interest on investment in any public property, equipment, and facilities of every executive department, independent establishment, bureau, office, and all and every agency under their control or direction involved in any work or operation undertaken by them or any article or thing produced.

The terms "wages", salaries", and "other compensation", whether included as a part of direct labor cost or as an item of overhead expense, shall include the remuneration paid to public employees during leave of absence and for holidays.

Whenever and wherever "overhead expenses", "administrative expenses", or interest on investment are allocable to two or more simultaneous projects, or to successive projects in the same accounting period, such allocation shall be made on a fair and equitable basis and in accordance with bases commonly accepted and followed in private industry.

SEC. 3. Every executive department, indpendent establishment, office, and bureau of the United States, or under their respective direction and control, shall promptly prepare upon the completion of a project, and keep a report of cost in accordance with the uniform cost-accounting system herein required, which shall clearly show the charges made for each of such items of cost, and if such cost includes the amounts for overhead expenses allocable to more than one project, shall set forth the basis on which allocation was made. Whenever and wherever any item or items of cost customarily incurred by private industry (such as insurance, compensation to employees for accidents and disease arising out of industrial employment, taxes, licenses, performance bonds and penalties), are not included in cost as herein required to be determined and reported because no expenditure therefor was made, such item or items shall be fully and clearly disclosed in each such report of cost.

SEC. 4. All reports required by section 3 shall be public records, available for inspection. Copies thereof may be had upon application and payment of a suitable fee under reasonable rules and regulations to be made by the head of the executive department, independent establishment, bureau, office, or other agency of the Government required to maintain such reports.

SEC. 5. Hereafter, whenever any estimate or bid shall be required or offered by any executive department, independent establishment, bureau, office, or other agency of the Government for work to be done or articles or things to be produced in competition with private bidders, such bids or estimates shall include an allowance for all the items directed by this act to be included in cost, regardless of the appropriation to which such items may be charged. Such bids or estimates shall fully and clearly disclose any and every item of cost customarily incurred by private bidders for the subject matter of competition but for which no allowance has been included in the official bid or estimate, because no charge or expenditure therefor will or has been made by such executive department, independent establishment, office, bureau, or other agency.

SEC. 6. Every executive department, indpendent establishment, bureau, office, or other agency of the Government shall annually prepare a report on all work undertaken or articles or things produced during the preceding fiscal year, which report shall show in composite form all of the cost entering into such work or production, and in addition shall set forth all losses occasioned during such fiscal year through the dismantlement or abandonment of property, equipment, and facilities used in or for such work or production or theretofore used for like work or production. The reports required by this paragraph shall likewise be public records, available for inspection.

PLANS OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE POST OFFICE AND POST ROADS

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting an address delivered over the National Broadcasting System on January 11 by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD] on the subject of postal legislation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEITER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address of Hon. JAMES M. MEAD, of New York, chairman of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, January 11, 1934:

Good afternoon: My listeners, I know, include both the patrons of the Postal Service and the postal employees. I want to speak to both of you and tell you of the plans of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads for this session of Congress. I want to tell the users of the mails what bills we are studying which will improve the service they are receiving, and I want to tell the postal employees of the legislation before the committee which affects them directly.

The Post Office Committee held its opening meeting Tuesday. At that meeting we went over the bills and outlined a program for the session, so that we might get to work immediately on the measures referred to our committee. In the last session, which was the special session, only emergency relief bills were permitted to come before the House; consequently all other bills introduced in that session, as well as the new bills now coming in, are before the committees at this time, and our committee has a large share of them.

The Postmaster General and his newly appointed First Assistant, Mr. Howes, were present at our meeting Tuesday. Both the departmental officials and the committee members pledged themselves to a program of cooperation, consideration of the needs of the postal employees, elimination of waste, and the improvement of the service.

In the words of the Postmaster General, speaking at that meeting, "Postmasters General come and go, and Assistant Postmasters General come and go, but the real work of the Postal Department is done by these hundreds of thousands of men who have served for many years. I want to do everything I can for them, and I also want to make the service of the Department as nearly perfect as it can be made."

Both the Department and the committee are keenly interested in building up the mails. Increased volume will reduce costs, enable us to give better service to the public, and put more men to work. It will also mean freedom to our regular employees from the fear of additional furloughs without pay and arbitrary retirements before they want to be retired.

Our postal substitutes are in a deplorable condition due to lack of work opportunities. If we can build up the mails, we can give them employment; this will take them off the charity relief rolls and make them once again self-supporting and self-respecting citizens.

The committee will consider legislation designed to insure to the substitutes in the Postal Service a guaranty of a minimum number of hours per week. This is a policy which many industries have followed for a number of years, and it is considered just compensation for men who are called upon to report for duty as frequently as several times a day.

We know that in all lines of business low rates attract and stimulate trade; so, naturally, in seeking to increase the mail business, our thoughts turn instinctively to postage rates and ways of decreasing these rates so as to attract more business without increasing the postal deficit.

The 3-cent rate has been responsible to a great extent in driving matter from the mails and reducing the postal volume. We want to get that matter back into the mails where it belongs and let Uncle Sam derive the revenue for delivering it.

Letter boxes are being stuffed with bills and circulars delivered by private messengers. Such boxes are intended for mail matter, and appropriate legislation to enforce the Postmaster General's recent ruling to this effect will be given an early hearing by the committee.

A hearing will also be held on the subject of letter postage rates. We want to know the views of the private mailers who send but a few letters a year, the views of the business men and large business houses with their thousands of letters, and the views of the Post Office Department and other experts.

We must not only offer attractive postage rates to the mailing public, but we must provide up-to-date service. The Post Office Department cannot afford to be behind the times if it is to serve the country efficiently.

Among the many suggestions for improving the mail transportation system is a bill to provide for the transportation and distribution of mail on motor-vehicle busses. Great quantities of mail are being transported by motor vehicles, particularly where train service has been discontinued. To speed up delivery and serve the public better, it is suggested that such mail be sorted and distributed en route on the busses, just as is done in the railway-mail cars.

As another means of keeping up with the times, we have introduced and will consider legislation to repeal the Reed bone-dry amendment, which prohibited the advertising of intoxicating liquors.

Another matter of great interest to the entire country is the air mail service. For years the air lines have been growing up under the Government's guidance and financial assistance. As a means of national defense, commercial aviation warrants this aid, but we feel that the time has arrived when this industry is ready to stand upon its own feet, and should be encouraged to do so.

Our air mail operators are anxious to become independent and prove their ability to carry the mail at a fair rate of cost; they want to get away from the word "subsidy", with its stigma. We believe that 50 or 60 percent of the operators could immediately enter the independent group if given the opportunity by the Government.

If the industry is to survive and develop in stability, rates of compensation for carrying the mail should be established and made more fixed and definite. We have endeavored to draw up a bill which will encourage aviation and promote its growth, and at the same time tend to put the industry on a self-supporting basis, and our committee will shortly announce hearings on this subject.

To popularize air mail, to give its patrons the benefit of the fastest possible service at reasonable rates, and to enable the industry not only to become self-supporting but to produce revenue for the Department, it is suggested in legislation that the air mail rate of postage be reduced from 10 cents to 5 cents per ounce, and that a postal airgram be adopted with the rate of postage set at 3 cents, and that in addition thereto an air mail postal card be permitted, which will be accepted at the rate of 2 cents.

Postal savings is another subject of interest. The Government is desirous of protecting the small depositor who uses this method of saving, and at the same time see to it that the banks are not deprived of business which would ordinarily be brought to them. Many improvements in the Postal Savings Service have been suggested and will be given early consideration by the committee.

The Department is losing approximately $12,000,000 annually in its money-order transactions, and to reduce this loss a bill has been presented which will revive the practice of issuing postal notes in lieu of money orders of the smaller denominations. A postal money order requires considerable checking and auditing both in the local post offices, as well as in the Department, and it is expected that postal notes will eliminate a great deal of this work, and at the same time prove both safe and satisfactory.

The committee hopes to see the full resoration of salaries to Government employees, and particularly to the postal employees, because they are suffering additional salary reductions through being denied automatic promotions, receiving reduced pay for night work, and reduced traveling expenses.

The postmasters not only have had their salaries reduced under the pay-cut order, but they are suffering further reductions by reason of the decline in postal receipts, their compensation being based upon the receipts at their offices.

The salaries of postal supervisors are affected in the same manner as the postmasters, and, in addition, by the large number of recent retirements and the fact that vacancies are not filled, as their salaries are not only based on postal receipts but upon the number of employees under their supervision.

The committee will work to relieve these conditions, and hopes that the new year will see a better Postal Service, a larger volume of postal business, and a better-paid postal personnel.

Thank you.

THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, several weeks ago the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] in a very scholarly manner delivered an address before the Mississippi Valley Association on the subject of the merchant marine. I think the House will be interested in reading it. I am sure the country will. It is a very splendid effort.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing this address in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Speaker, the House granted me permission to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD an address by the Honorable S. O. BLAND, Chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine, Radio, and Fisheries of the House of Representatives. This address was delivered before the annual convention of the Mississippi Valley Association in the city of St. Louis on November 27, 1933.

In my opinion no Member of either branch of the Congress has given more thought and study to the question of how the American people can best maintain a merchant marine than this distinguished Virginian, Mr. BLAND, whose services as a member of the Committee on Merchant Marine, and now as its chairman, are of inestimable value to the American people. For many years he has taken a leading part in framing legislation designed to establish and maintain our merchant flag upon the high seas. While the administration of the acts of Congress may in some instances be subject to criticism, the policy of maintaining an adequate merchant marine is no longer a debatable one in the minds of the American people. The efficiency of its maintenance affects directly and indirectly the welfare of every citizen of the Republic. The lack of a merchant marine which confronted the Nation at the beginning of the last war brought home to us the absolute necessity of keeping our merchant ships upon the seas.

Believing the Members of the Congress, as well as many citizens throughout the Nation, would read with great interest Mr. BLAND'S address in which he, with his characteristic statesmanship and scholarly ability, has so forcefully presented the importance of an American merchant marine in our national life, it is with pleasure that I present the following for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

It was gracious of you to honor me with an invitation to be with you today. I am acquainted with the plans, purposes, and excellent work of your organization. We of the East look upon you as zealous partners in promoting the foreign and domestic commerce of the United States.

You desire to advance the interests of the Mississippi Valley and we are with you. Whatever helps you, helps us.

Yorktown, where closed the war for American independence, is in my district. A shaft stands there to commemorate the consummation of our struggle to establish ourselves a nation. On that shaft are these words:

"One country—one Constitution—one destiny."

We know these words to be true. If you prosper, we shall share in your prosperity. If you suffer, we shall feel the loss.

The objects and purposes of your organization, among others, are:

"To advance the interests of the Mississippi Valley by the development of foreign and domestic commerce; the broadening of the outlets and inlets for the commerce of the interior of the United States; the increase and development of the American merchant marine; the development and maintenance of all practicable, navigable channels and the harbors serving them as arteries of transportation; the formulation and prosecution of measures calculated to make common carriers on waterways and highways an integral part of the transportation of the country * * *."

You have long supported measures which will promote these purposes, and to that end you have been at all times the friend of an American merchant marine.

I consider it appropriate, therefore, at this time and in this place, with these objectives in mind, that I should talk to you for a while about our American merchant marine, its importance in our national life, and its needs.

In recognizing an American merchant marine as a primary need of our country and vital to its welfare and defense, you have placed yourselves in the company of a formidable array of witnesses whose integrity no man can challenge, whose wisdom and foresight no man can deny, and whose patriotic devotion and zeal no student of history can question. These witnesses cover the entire period of our national life, and the testimony of the earliest of these witnesses is confirmed by events in our later years.

My first witness will be the first President of the United States, the Father of his Country, and the great American of whom it may be said as truly today as when his eulogy was pronounced by Light-Horse Harry Lee, that he was, is, and will ever be "First in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen."

Remembering that even before we entered the World War the cotton of the South and the grain of the West congested the wharves and docks and terminals of this country because foreign ships on which we had relied were no longer neutral, and remembering that war-time freight rates and insurance became prohibitive, let us hear what Washington said long ago. Hear him in one of his first messages to the Congress of the United States:

"We should not overlook the tendency of war to abridge the means, and thereby at least enhance the price, of transporting productions to their proper markets. I recommend it to your serious reflections how far and in what mode it may be expedient to guard against embarrassments from these contingencies by such encouragement to our own navigation as will render our commerce less dependent on foreign bottoms which may fail us in the very moments most interesting to both these great objects. * * * There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure."

If this illustrious patriot, whose every thought was the welfare of that nation which he more than any other had brought into being, had looked with prophetic vision into the troubled years of 1914, and had delivered his charge to his countrymen with those very times in mind, he could not have spoken more truly or urged more strongly measures necessary to our national defense.

In line with these declarations of Washington were the remarks of Mr. Nicholas, of Virginia, in a speech made by him in the House of Representatives in 1794, when he said:

"In time of war, in addition to the inconveniences before stated, which are enhanced by throwing the trade from its accustomed channel, there are great and important losses brought on a country by this kind of dependence. If your carriers are parties to the war, you are subjected to the war freight, and war insurance on your cargoes, and you are cut off from all markets to which they are hostile; and, indeed, from our experience in the present war, I may say you are cut off from the markets of your carriers themselves."

These words were just as true in 1914 as when spoken in 1794, for we saw ourselves cut off from the markets of Great Britain, France, Italy, Germany, and other nations of Europe with few exceptions and those at practically prohibitive rates of freight and insurance.

These witnesses appeared before the days of definite party organizations. We are today mostly Democrats or Republicans, and since the Republican Party is now the minority party, let us call first a few witnesses from its ranks.

I present another war President, General Grant who, in one of his messages, said:

"A nation of the vast and ever-increasing interior resources of the United States must one day possess its full share of the commerce of these oceans no matter what the cost. Delay will only increase the cost."

The price we paid in 1914 was staggering and yet there are today patriotic American citizens who would adopt a policy which must inevitably lead to a similar cost in the future.

May I add that delay cost us the enormous cash outlay in the World War of over three and one half billion dollars, and that even this stupendous expenditure only provided ships hurriedly built, expressly designed for the sole purpose of winning the war, and of bridging the seas with ships. Those ships were ill prepared to meet peace-time competition. We were called upon to pay in a few years for our negligence with a sum of money equal to a yearly subsidy of $20,000,000 for more than 150 years.

Continuing, General Grant said:

"Building ships and navigating them utilizes vast capital at home; it employs thousands of workmen in their construction and manning; it creates a home market for the products of the farm and shop; it diminishes the balance of trade against us precisely to the extent of freights and passenger money paid to American vessels, and gives us a supremacy upon the seas of inestimable value in case of foreign wars."

Another outstanding Republican President, Theodore Roosevelt, in a message to Congress, said:

"Ships work for their own countries just as railroads work for their terminal points. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon the ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods."

Again, he said:

"To the spread of our trade in peace and the defense of our flag in war a great and prosperous merchant marine is indispensable. We should have ships of our own and seamen of our own to convey our goods to neutral markets, and in case of need, to reinforce our battle line."

President Harrison, another Republican President, said:

"There is nothing more justly humiliating to the national pride and nothing more hurtful to the national prosperity than the inferiority of our merchant marine compared with that of other nations. I am an advocate of economy in our national expenditure, but it is a misuse of terms to make this word describe a policy that withholds an expenditure for the purpose of extending our foreign commerce."

Let us invoke the spirit of the martyred war President, William McKinley, who knew the humiliation which we suffered in the Spanish-American War, when we had not American ships or seamen sufficient for the war, when we had to search the ports of Europe for transports and colliers, when we even bought war steamers abroad, when we had to enlist landsmen and foreign seamen to man our fighting vessels, and when returns show that fully one third of our naval crews were foreigners. If the countries of which these foreigners were nationals had favored the enemy we would have been short of men and ships.

President McKinley said:

"Our national development will be one-sided and unsatisfactory as long as the remarkable growth of our inland industries remains unaccompanied by progress upon the seas. There is no lack of constitutional authority for legislation which shall give to this country maritime strength commensurate with its industrial achievements and with its rank among the nations of the earth.

"We must encourage our merchant marine. We must have more ships. They must be under the American flag, built and manned and owned by Americans. They will not only be profitable in a commercial sense; they will be messengers of peace and amity wherever they go."

Permit me now to call upon some of our Democratic witnesses and foremost among them I present the founder of the Democratic Party, the author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson.

In 1793, while acting as Secretary of War, Thomas Jefferson said:

"Were the ocean, which is the common property of all, open to the industry of all, so that every person and vessel should be free to take employment wherever it could be found, the United States would certainly not set the example of appropriating to themselves exclusively any portion of the common stock of occupation. They would rely on the enterprise and activity of their citizens for a due participation in the benefits of the seagoing business, and for keeping the marine class of citizens equal to their object. But if particular nations grasp at undue shares, and more especially if they seize on the means of the United States to convert them into aliment for their own strength, and withdraw them entirely from the support of those to whom they belong, defensive and protecting measures become necessary on the part of the nation whose marine resources are thus invaded; or it will be disarmed of its defense, its productions will be at the mercy of the nation which has possessed itself exclusively of the means of carrying them, and its politics may be influenced by those who command its commerce. The carriage of its own commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire. If we lose the seamen and artists whom it now occupies, we lose the present means of marine defense, and time will be requisite to raise up others, when disgrace or losses shall bring to our feelings the error of having abandoned them."

How apt are these words when applied to the conditions existing in the World War, when self-defense, commercial and military, compelled the expenditure of over three and one half billion dollars!

Again, said Mr. Jefferson:

"For a navigating people to purchase its marine afloat would be a strange speculation, as the marine would always be dependent upon the merchants furnishing them. Placing as a reserve with a foreign nation or in a foreign shipyard the carpenters, blacksmiths, calkers, sailmakers, and the vessels of a nation would be a singular commercial combination. We must, therefore, build them for ourselves. * * *

"To force shipbuilding is to establish shipyards; is to form magazines; to multiply useful hands; to produce artists and workmen of every kind who may be found at once for peaceful speculations of commerce and for the terrible wants of war."

Again, Mr. Jefferson said:

"It is as a resource of defense that our navigation will admit neither neglect nor forbearance. The carriage of our commodities, if once established in another channel, cannot be resumed in the moment we may desire."

Jefferson declared that agriculture, manufactures, commerce, and navigation constituted the four pillars of our prosperity.

Madison, another patron saint of Democracy, speaking in the House of Representatives on the subject of a discriminating tonnage tax in the interest of an American merchant marine, used language applicable to the southern interest in a merchant marine which applies as well to southern and western interests today.

Mr. Madison said:

"As they have so much valuable and bulky produce to carry to market, it is their interest to possess a conveyance for it, that they may be as little affected as possible by the contingencies and wars of other nations."

President Tyler advocated a subsidy to secure a foreign trade service. In his annual message in 1844 President Tyler said:

"I cannot too strongly urge the policy of authorizing the establishment of a line of steamships regularly to ply between this country and foreign ports and upon our own waters for the transportation of the mail. The example of the British Government is well worthy of imitation in this respect."

In 1847 President Polk, another war President, made a similar recommendation.

President Polk said:

"The enlightened policy by which a rapid communication with the various distant parts of the world is established by means of American-built steamers will find an ample reward in the increase of our commerce and in making our country and its resources more favorably known abroad."

In his annual message of 1894 that sturdy American and rugged champion of democracy, Grover Cleveland, said:

"The millions now paid to foreigners for carrying American passengers and products across the sea should be turned into American hands."

The process of time brought another great Democrat and another war President into the White House. Woodrow Wilson said in a message to Congress:

"How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we are to wait for the trade to develop without them? The Government must open those gates of trade, and open them wide; open them before it is altogether profitable to open them, or altogether reasonable to ask private capital to open them."

Again Mr. Wilson said:

"To speak plainly, we have grossly erred in the way in which we have stunted and hindered the development of our merchant marine. * * * It is necessary for many weighty reasons of national efficiency and development that we should have a great merchant marine. * * * It is high time we repaired our mistake and resumed our commercial independence on the sea."

Again:

"Moreover, we can develop no true or effective American policy without ships of our own—not ships of war but ships of peace, carrying goods, and carrying much more; creating friendships and rendering indispensable services to all interests on this side of the water. They must move constantly back and forth between the Americas. They are the only shuttles that can weave the delicate fabric of sympathy, comprehension, confidence, and mutual dependence in which we wish to clothe our policy of America for Americans."

Many more witnesses might be produced. Their evidence would only prove cumulative, and some of them will be quoted later. Suffice it now to mention President Hayes, President Arthur, President Taft, President Harding, President Coolidge, President Hoover, Benjamin Franklin, Senator Rufus King, of New York, later Minister to Great Britain; Senator Rush, of Texas; Senator James Barbour, of Virginia; Senator and later Secretary of State James G. Blaine; Secretary of State Elihu Root, and a host of others.

The facts demonstrate the need for a merchant marine.

The World War proved beyond any possibility of question that merchant marine was a necessity.

In 1914 conditions brought about by the World War caused foreign ships upon which we had depended for the carriage of our goods to be withdrawn from our trade and compelled Congress to take action for our relief. The American merchant marine had declined to a point below Norway, Italy, and Japan. Our percentage of water-borne foreign commerce carried in American vessels had declined from 89⅞ percent in 1830 to 8⅞ percent. With a foreign trade more than one tenth of the world's business in a year, we possessed a merchant marine capable of transporting only 8.9 percent of it. We had registered for deep water only 810 steamers of 666,593 gross tons, and 469 sailing vessels of 234,616 gross tons. Our foreign commerce was carried in foreign bottoms. We relied upon Great Britain, France, Germany, Italy, Austria, and other nations. Their ships were withdrawn just as Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and all of the other illustrious witnesses whom we have called predicted that they would be. Cargoes destined for the nations of the world congested our yards, dock terminals, and railroad sidings for miles. The East, the South, the West, the North all alike felt the destructive force of our misguided policies. The South resorted to its movement to buy a bale of cotton to save the cotton farmer.

Enormous and prohibitive freight rates followed. Our witnesses had told us this would follow. Cotton jumped from 35 cents per hundred pounds to $11; wheat from 8 cents a bushel to $1.36; flour from 10 cents a hundred pounds to $1; and general cargo rates increased to 10 times their normal level. Insurance rates and war rates became prohibitive. The burden was unbearable, and under the guiding hand of the great war President, Woodrow Wilson, with the aid of an illustrious son of Missouri, Joshua W. Alexander, then chairman of the committee over which I now have the honor to preside, and later Secretary of Commerce, there was enacted the first shipping bill of later years, the act of 1916, whose purpose was to restore the American flag to the seas. This act created the United States Shipping Board and gave it authority to form one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States with a capital stock not to exceed $50,000,000.

Before this legislation could accomplish its objectives, the United States entered the war, and the legislation required to win the war resulted in an expenditure of over $3,500,000,000, leaving us after the war with a hastily constructed fleet of 2,314 vessels of all kinds inadequately designed for the intense competition of world trade.

After mature consideration of the problems of preserving permanently a merchant marine and protecting this Nation from again paying such an enormous price for its neglect of an American merchant marine, the Congress passed the Merchant Marine Act of 1920, wherein it expressly declared—

"That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best-equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States; and it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to do whatever may be necessary to develop and encourage the maintenance of such a merchant marine, and, insofar as may not be inconsistent with the express provisions of this act, the United States Shipping Board shall, in the disposition of vessels and shipping property as hereinafter provided, in the making of rules and regulations, and in the administration of the shipping laws keep always in view this purpose and object as the primary end to be obtained."

Provision was made for the sale of ships and for the establishment of essential trade routes, the vessels to be operated by the Board if sale could not be made to private persons.

To the end that all ports and communities should be equitably served it was provided that preference in the sale or assignment of vessels should be given to persons who are citizens of the United States who have the support, financial and otherwise, of the domestic communities primarily interested in such lines, if the Board should be satisfied of the ability of such persons to maintain the service desired and proposed to be maintained, or to persons who were citizens of the United States who might be then maintaining a service from the port of the United States to or in the general direction of the world-market port to which the Board had determined that such service should be established.

Provision was made for the creation out of sales of a construction-loan fund for loans to aid private citizens in the construction of vessels of the best and most efficient type for the establishment or maintenance of services on lines deemed desirable by the Board.

Under the act of 1920, 38 services were established to various ports of the world, and they were operated under various agreements whereby the loss fell upon the Government, and appropriations for these losses amounted to forty and fifty million dollars annually. The ships had been hastily constructed for winning the war and were slow and inadequate to the purposes of world commerce. Practically no ships were constructed. Some sales were made, but with the increase of competition and depressed conditions payments were not completed. The American-borne trade declined from 51 percent in 1921 to 44 percent in 1923, 34 percent in 1927, and barely 32 percent in 1928.

In the meantime the American shipbuilding industry continued to decline to such an extent that of 7,900,000 tons of sea-going vessels of 4,500 gross tons and over constructed in the world between January 1921 and August 1927, the United States built only 309,000 tons. By March 1928 only 2 percent of the world's construction was in our shipyards.

Great Britain and other maritime nations were building modern ships. Between 1922 and 1928 nearly 800 newly built foreign ships were put into our trade. The situation was that Great Britain alone had 1,034 ships of a speed of 12 knots and faster, while we had 180. She had 153 ships of 16 knots speed—we had 51. She had 37 of 18 knots speed, and we had 12. She had 16 of 20 knots speed, and we had 5.

Germany, despite her financial condition, had placed $12,000,000 at the disposal of the German steamship companies as loans, which were to represent a 50-percent contribution toward the shipbuilding program of the individual shipowners.

France, in 1924, guaranteed a loan of $10,000,000 for a 25-year period, the loan being at 7 percent, the 7 percent to be paid not to the Government but to purchasers of these debentures, and American bankers handled the loan.

The evidence before the Committee on Merchant Marine, when the hearings on the Jones-White Act were held, contained a statement to the effect that it was reported in the French press that the Government was drawing up a bill to be presented to the Chamber of Deputies providing for a system of subsidies to the French merchant marine in the form of loans at low rates of interest to companies laying down vessels in French shipyards.

The need for an American merchant marine, privately owned and operated, was considered most carefully, and it was shown that 4,085 foreign-flag vessels of 19,000,000 gross tons carried more than 66 percent of our foreign trade. More than 20 percent of these vessels had been built since 1921. At the same time 1,675 American-flag vessels, of 7,000,000 gross tons, carried less than 34 percent of our foreign trade, less than 4 percent having been built since 1921, and not a single common carrier for foreign trade having been built in this country since the war.

It was testified that at the end of 1927, Germany, Italy, Holland, France, Sweden, and Denmark, in addition to Great Britain, each in the order named, was building more tonnage than the United States, while the United States stood a poor eighth in ships under construction.

One witness, speaking of the American fleet as it existed then, said:

"The ships you have are virtually all practically of a type; there is not any use for them now in particular, because they are not diversified in design and type. Ships are just as different as people. In the deadweight carriers you have a fleet, I might call them, of unskilled laborers; these ships carry deadweight cargo. If you had enough cotton to carry out of the southern ports, or enough coal to carry out of Virginia and Alabama ports, and enough wheat to carry to keep your whole outfit going, they might be utilized; but these ships are all of a type—pretty good ships, but too many of a kind. It is just as if you were operating a railroad and had an overplus of coal cars, but not enough passenger cars, baggage cars, and box cars."

There were considered at this and at previous hearings the differential in construction costs and operating expenses; the necessity for Government aid in providing for the establishment of a merchant marine; the construction of new ships; the transfer of Government routes to private owners; and the conversion of existing ships into better ships more modern in type, with increased speed, better suited to meet the competition of foreign lines, and to furnish the auxiliaries needed for the Navy in time of emergency.

Exhaustive testimony was taken as to the subsidies and aids, existing and contemplated by other countries.

One of the problems before the Congress involved the replacement of American ships. They were being operated at the approximate cost of $40,000,000 annually, and were wearing out. The time was in sight when, after all this expense, this country would have no merchant marine. The bill which came from the Senate looked to replacements at Government expense. The House committee substituted a bill that it was hoped would provide for the transfer of the American fleet to private hands and would secure permanency.

The benefits sought by the legislation may be summarized as follows:

1. To secure the sale of existing Government-owned lines to private operators and relieve the United States of the burden which it was carrying at that time under Government ownership and operation.

2. To secure the modernization of old tonnage and ultimate replacements with new tonnage which would keep the American merchant marine modern and able to compete with foreign nations.

3. To provide a continuing policy whereby the American merchant marine might be kept permanent, and, by limiting the contracts to a maximum period of 10 years, to provide an opportunity for gradual reduction in mail pay as the increasing support of the American merchant marine by the American public would reduce the necessity for aid.

4. To give to American shippers then using American lines and also to those using foreign lines inducements thereafter to patronize American lines with reasonable assurance that they would not be compelled later to return to foreign lines at increased cost.

5. To guarantee to American shippers reasonable freight rates and liberate them from continuing dependence upon foreign carriers at whose mercy they were so long as no American merchant marine existed for their protection.

6. To guarantee to American manufacturers and farmers that their products should have an opportunity to reach the markets of the world at reasonable prices and without the danger of discriminations, handicaps, and unfavorable trade practices which had often in the past aided foreign commerce and burdened American commerce.

7. To provide for the growth and development of harbors and ports throughout the United States.

8. To provide a reservoir of ships for national defense in time of war and for promotion of commerce in time of peace.

9. To provide a school in which men and officers might be trained for use in time of national emergency.

10. To provide labor for American citizens in American yards and in forest, and in field and mine and factory in every State of the Union in order to supply the materials needed for the construction and operation of ships.

11. To secure to American shipyards the benefit of ship repairs, and to American merchants a market for the supplies, equipment, and stores required by our ships and which would go otherwise to foreign competitors.

12. To retain for this Nation the freight money which would be paid otherwise to foreign countries, estimated in a period of 10 years to aggregate from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000, annually.

13. To provide definite fixed schedules for the life of the contract so that American shippers might have stability in their trade relations with the world.

14. To furnish a replacement program which would result in a reservoir for armed ships in time of need since all ships were required to be constructed according to plans and specifications approved by the Navy Department, and so built that guns might be placed upon them when necessary for the national defense.

15. To protect the Government from excessive war burdens since all ships constructed under the act could be taken over by the President in a national emergency at their then cost without any appreciation in value by reason of the emergency.

16. To provide necessary auxiliaries for the Navy.

Consideration must be given to the result if Government aid should not be provided. If, as appeared from the evidence in 1928, the ships cannot or will not be privately operated, then either the Government must recapture all ships and operate them, or the American merchant marine must perish. We have tried Government ownership and operation, and we know the result. Under previous Government operation, replacements did not follow, and we faced the problem that when the ships should wear out, foreign countries would regain control of the seas and levy tribute at will.

As the late Honorable Clay Stone Briggs wisely said in his last appearance on this subject:

"If the American merchant marine should be abandoned, it would not only subject the farming and manufacturing interests of the United States to an enormous increase in ocean freight rates with destruction of our ability to carry our commerce to every port of the world, without regard to ships of other nations, and would not only deprive America of a revenue of ocean freight receipts of from $250,000,000 to $300,000,000 annually and our Navy of all auxiliary vessels but would likewise result in the loss to the United States of loans upon new ships of approximately $150,000,000 and of many millions more in unpaid amounts of purchase money still due the United States in the sale of its lines to private interests."

It should be added also that as navies are reduced the merchant marine of a country becomes correspondingly its navy. Sink today all naval vessels in the world, and the nation having the largest merchant marine is instantly possessed of the largest navy in the world.

The purchase money still unpaid for lines sold aggregates $24,909,094.33, while the loans on ships built and reconditioned amount to $126,614,843.53, or a grand total of $151,523,937.86. These moneys are secured by a first lien on the ships, but if seized by the Government the contribution of $109,515,349.39 made out of private funds will be lost by those contributors. Obviously, consideration must be given this feature of the problem.

Among other results which may flow from failure to maintain our merchant marine are the following:

1. Foreign lines will immediately seize the opportunity of taking over the services from which lines are withdrawn or on which sailings are reduced, and this they will have no difficulty in doing with their large amount of idle tonnage.

2. The shippers and merchants who have supported the American-flag services must turn again to foreign ships. One of the greatest handicaps which the American merchant marine has suffered has been doubt in its permanence.

3. Foreign lines may pursue such a rate policy as will give them the utmost benefit in revenue irrespective of the damage which that policy may mean to our foreign commerce. This policy would add many millions in freight money which our foreign commerce will have to bear.

4. Suspension or cancelation of services must necessarily result in the destruction of shipping agencies which have been built up during the past 14 years, both here and abroad, and which were so sadly lacking when our services were first established. The loss of this trained personnel may be considered as disastrous to the American merchant marine.

5. If the vessels are taken over by the Government and not operated, a considerable sum must be expended in placing them in lay-up, in preserving the vessels and their equipment, and in making repairs which will be inevitable before the vessels can be placed in operation again.

6. The abandonment of our present services would stop the development of port facilities which have been undertaken under the declared policy of our Merchant Marine Act in the interest of the most economical movement of our foreign commerce.

7. The abandonment of these services would affect the livelihood of American seamen and their families, for they would be thrown out of work with little chance for reemployment, as foreign lines employ crews of their own nationalities.

8. The abandonment of established services would mean the loss of millions spent in this country for repairs, ship supplies, equipment, stores, and food; would reduce by millions the buying power of the Nation; and would create unemployment and distress in the home life of our licensed officers and other ship personnel, as well as the shore personnel.

9. The abandonment of established services would remove the greatest and most beneficial factor in stabilizing freight rates. We are now in position to have a part in the fixing of these rates and to force reasonable rates through this Government's control over its own shipping. Moreover, under the Merchant Marine Acts of 1916, 1920, and 1928 we may prevent deferred rebates, retaliations, discriminations, or unfair practices and compel filing of reports, rates, and full memoranda of facts, all of which will be lost without an American merchant marine under our regulation. Retaliatory tariffs at present operating against American commerce would certainly not invite us to surrender existing instrumentalities for our defense, commercial or political.

Of course Government aid to private industry of any kind is not desired if it is possible to avoid it, but Government aid for necessary national benefits has become a part of our national policy.

President Harding in his message in 1922 called attention to this, when he said:

"If 'Government aid' is a fair term—and I think it is—to apply to authorizations aggregating $75,000,000 to provide good roads for market highways, it is equally fit to be applied to the establishment and maintenance of American market highways on the seas. If 'Government aid' is the proper designation for fifteen to forty millions annually expended to improve and maintain inland waterways in aid of commerce, it is a proper designation for a needed assistance to establish and maintain ocean highways where there is actual commerce to be carried. * * * We have aided industry through our tariffs, we have aided railway transportation in land grants and loans, we have aided the construction of market roads and improvement of inland waterways. We have aided reclamation and irrigation and the development of water power, and we have loaned seed grains in anticipation of harvests. We expended millions in investigation and experimentation to promote a common benefit, though a limited few are the direct beneficiaries. We have loaned hundreds of millions to promote marketing of American goods. It has all been commendable and highly worth while."

Government aid is provided in many directions and in many ways. Consider for instance the tariff duties which in some instances have become prohibitive; embargoes which are expressly authorized by law; processing taxes applied on certain commodities to be borne by the processor and ultimately by the consumer; millions expended in appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the declared purpose of benefiting the farmer; the collection and dissemination to American producers, importers, exporters, and other persons at Government expense, of information relative to the world supply of and need for American agricultural products; aids to cooperative marketing; eradication of diseases to agriculture such as barberry eradication, fighting insect pests, suppression of European fowl pest, campaign against animal tuberculosis, cattle tick eradication, hog-cholera eradication, fighting the bollweevil, soil surveys, predatory animal control; Federal Farm Credit Administration; trust law exemptions, and hundreds of others.

Similarly, the benefits received by the newspapers and magazines may be considered as Government aids. The Postmaster General's report shows us that the cost of merchant marine routes under contracts awarded under the Jones-White Act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, was $22,431,791.04 while the cost at poundage rates paid vessels of American registry would have been $3,267,453.33, or an increase for that year of $19,164,337.71 over poundage rates.

During the same fiscal year an analysis of postal receipts and expenditures, based upon each $100 expended, shows that total revenues from second-class mailing accounted for $2.91, while expenditures represented $15.74. Another tabulation shows that total revenues from second-class matter were $23,149,305.44, while expenditures for delivering and handling this same class of mail exceeded revenues by $102,144,290.33. Cheap postage to newspapers and magazines has meant an aid much greater than the aid to the merchant marine.

Let us admit that evils exist under the Merchant Marine Act. No law is perfect at first, and time is required to correct unanticipated evils. They must and will be corrected. When Government money is spent there should always be the fullest investigation into those expenditures. The American people welcome all the light that may be thrown upon the operation of the law, and American intelligence must remedy these evils in such a way as not to impair or destroy the merchant marine. Limitations on the expenses of the beneficiaries in the pay of officials must be imposed. Closer supervision by Government agencies must be provided. Contract beneficiaries must know that they must in a short time become 100 percent American, and that their foreign affiliations must be severed.

Contract beneficiaries must understand that they must, in spirit as well as in letter, employ the full quota of American help provided under the law.

Contract beneficiaries must know that they are trustees handling public funds for the benefit of American trade, American labor, and American welfare.

Some practical way must be found to make the benefits more flexible and variable, fluctuating between reasonable maximums and minimums as varying conditions demand.

We must and will approach this problem in a constructive way; not destroying what we have but remolding, rebuilding, repairing, and correcting to the end that the evils which exist shall be removed; stability shall be secured; replacements as needed shall be made; and the American flag kept permanently upon the seas.

The problem of Government aid will be largely disposed of when the American public realizes that it becomes the duty of American shippers and American travelers to patronize American ships. Your association is rendering a great public service in your efforts to achieve these results.

Throughout this land hospitals have been built for the care of the wounded and the disabled of the World War. In every State, county, city, and town are men suffering from some form of affliction incident to that struggle. In every State, county, city, and town there are vacant chairs, and there are thousands upon thousands who long for the touch of a vanished hand and listen in the quiet hours of the night for the sound of a voice that is still.

In every part of our land and on the quiet fields of Flanders and of France are the green graves of men who in their early manhood, while yet in the prime of life, paid the supreme sacrifice.

Weighing my words, conscious of the responsibility which is mine as a legislator of this country, desiring only my country's defense and the public weal, afflicted as are we all with the distress, the suffering, and the sorrow of the World War, I state it as my solemn conviction that if we had heeded the warnings of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and the other illustrious witnesses and wise statesmen whom today I have invoked in my behalf, and if we had possessed in 1917 an efficient merchant marine, adequate for the carriage of 50 percent of our trade and available for instant conversion into armed vessels of war, we would never have been called upon to enter that struggle.

I believe with all my soul that if we had been ready in 1917 with an adequate merchant marine Germany would never have pursued the policy which she then adopted and which involved us in the war. I believe with all my soul that if in 1917 we had possessed an adequate American merchant marine the World War with all its untold horrors would never have come upon us.

You men of the Mississippi Valley Association have done much to carry the message of the merchant marine to America. Keep up the fight. Be not weary in well-doing, and the inherent patriotism, sound common sense, and devoted zeal of the American people must and will keep our flag upon the seas.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is printed in one of the morning papers what I think is a very able and logical editorial in favor of the ratification of the pending St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty. The Hearst paper which I have and in which the editorial appears is the New York American. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to lie on the table and be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York American, Jan. 16, 1934]

PRESIDENT IS RIGHT IN ASKING SENATE TO RATIFY ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY TREATY

The St. Lawrence Waterway Treaty should be ratified.

The President's message to the Senate admirably summarized the arguments for ratification and effectively answered the main objections urged against the treaty.

It can freely be admitted that some of the opposition to the treaty is conscientious and sincere. The project involves a great expenditure. A considerable period must elapse before the beneficial effects of this great highway to the sea will be felt and perhaps a longer period before it will yield returns upon its cost.

But, for the most part, the forces seeking to defeat ratification are local and selfish.

They should not prevail against a great national work of enlightened development, clearly indicated to be so natural and inevitable that it must be regarded as a part of the destined progress of a great people.

The President makes the point that every great improvement directed to better commercial communications had been opposed by local interests which, to use his words, "conjure up imaginary fears and fail to realize that improved transportation results in increased commerce, benefiting directly or indirectly all sections."

This has certainly been true of the railroads pushing into new territory. Every project for the deepening of our rivers or the building of canals has encountered the same resistance, and even the Panama Canal—which has so amply vindicated the vision of those who early foresaw its importance, both as a contribution to our defense and security and the narrowing of the distances separating us from the friendly nations of South America—had the same opposition to overcome.

Of course, the Power Trust sees in this great project only a threat against its monopoly of the electric utilities and its undisputed control of rates to the consuming public. As a matter of instinct and habit, this swollen Trust opposes anything which threatens its long-enjoyed right to exploit the people and to hold the great consumer class in bondage and subjection to its greed.

Opposition from this source is always adriot and sometimes hard to overcome. Its full force was exerted against the Tennessee Valley development, the Boulder Dam on the Colorado River, and the Columbia River projects in the Northwest.

The Power Trust now sees in the St. Lawrence development a source of cheap power, located in proximity to a great industrial and rural market and within transmission distance of millions of domestic consumers.

Such a fact is enough for the Power Trust. All its influence, both open and covert; its command of friendly columns in the press and the eager service by its minions in public positions, can be counted against ratification.

But the people will not be deceived by arguments coming from such sources.

They will take a national viewpoint of the matter. They will see that sectional objections are not to be weighed against the interests of all the people of the country in the broad principle of reducing the cost of transportation, upon which so directly depend the revival of trade and the well-being of the workers.

The St. Lawrence waterway is a noble conception. Its appreciation requires vision—the vision to see not only its immediate advantages, which are sufficient to justify it, but its immeasurable significance to the future greatness of the country and the business of its people.

The President has the right to ask for the ratification of this treaty. He is seconded by intelligent opinion throughout the country.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD subsequently said: Mr. President, in reference to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] this morning when inserting in the RECORD the Hearst editorial dealing with the pending treaty, I would call attention to the fact that the editorial is in line with the long-established policy of the Hearst papers extending over many years in support of the promotion of inland waterways. Those who have faith in the development of the country through the development of inland waterways owe Mr. Hearst a debt of gratitude for the vision he has shown in his national policy on that subject.

GREAT LAKES-ST. LAWRENCE DEEP WATERWAY TREATY—RESERVATIONS

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I send to the desk sundry reservations which it is my intention to offer at the proper time to the pending St. Lawrence Treaty, and ask that they be printed for the information of the Senate and lie on the table.

I would like to say further at this time, in just a word, that it is not my intention to offer the reservation having to do with the diversion of water from Georgian Bay unless the reservation covering the diversion of water from Lake Michigan is first rejected.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that he also ask to have the proposed reservations printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CLARK. I make that request, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the reservations intended to be proposed by Mr. CLARK were ordered to lie on the table, to be printed, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESERVATION

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in the consideration of the so-called "alcoholic beverage control bill" for the District of Columbia, which will come up during the day, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. REYNOLDS] will have charge of the bill. PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

House Joint Memorial No. 1

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

We, your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the Congress of the United States of America has imposed a tax upon all sales of gasoline; and

Whereas said tax has been increased rather than removed as petitioned by this body in previous legislative sessions; and

Whereas the State of Oregon and the other several States of the Union have already placed as much tax on said gasoline sales as the traffic will legitimately bear, added thereto the Federal tax is untimely and prohibitive and should be immediately removed; and

Whereas the taxation of gasoline sales should properly be left to the exclusive use of the States as a means of providing funds for administration, road building, and relief programs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon (the senate jointly concurring therein), That this legislative assembly petition and memorialize the Congress of the United States of America to take immediate steps to remove the Federal gasoline-sales tax and that henceforth such taxation be left to the exclusive control of the several States; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to forward one copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to each Member of both Houses of Congress, and to the Governors of each of the respective States.

Adopted by the house December 2, 1933.

EARL W. SNELL,
Speaker of the House.

Concurred in by the senate December 7, 1933.

FRED E. KIDDLE,
President of the Senate.

STATE OF OREGON,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Hal E. Hoss, secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify:

That I have carefully compared the annexed copy of House Joint Memorial No. 1 with the original thereof adopted by the senate and house of representatives of the second special session of the Thirty-seventh Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon and filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon December 9, 1933, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof, together with all endorsements thereon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon. Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 29th day of December, A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] HAL E. HOSS,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York, N.Y., endorsing the so-called "Wagner-Costigan anti-lynching bill", being the bill (S. 1978) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the ways and means committee of the Arkansas Education Association, favoring the passage of legislation to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or its successor, to cash registered school-district warrants at a reasonable discount, and also the making of an appropriation of $250,000,000 for the relief of public schools during the economic emergency, which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

He also laid before the Senate petitions numerously signed by sundry citizens, being employees of the Federal Government, of the States of Alabama, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maine, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, and Tennessee, praying for the passage of legislation, sponsored by the American Federation of Labor and the American Federation of Government Employees, to abolish the 15-percent pay cut affecting the compensation of Federal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RESOLUTIONS OF KANSAS STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred resolutions adopted by the Kansas State Board of Agriculture at its meeting in Topeka, Kans., January 10–12, 1934.

The resolutions are short, to the point, and, I believe, most illuminating. The State Board of Agriculture of Kansas is a cross section of the State of Kansas; it consists of representatives from every county in the State, and, as a matter of fact, it is a good cross section of the agriculture of the Middle West. So when this organization speaks its mind, what it says is worth your consideration and my consideration.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions relating to national affairs, as adopted by the Kansas State Board of Agriculture at its sixty-third annual meeting, held at Topeka, January 10–12, 1934

We heartily commend the Federal Government in its broad and sustained efforts for economic parity of agriculture, and we urge all citizens to squarely back the administration's agricultural policy.

We urge the Federal administration to give its attention to the existing surplus of dairy products and the ruinous prices confronting the dairy farmers of the country, to the end that the surplus may be removed and prices restored.

Owing to unprecedented low prices for livestock in all markets, due to many unfavorable factors, including the refusal of the packers to cooperate with the Government's program of recovery, we favor and demand that all necessary authority be granted Secretary Wallace to put in operation immediately regulations that will maintain prices comparable to other farm commodities.

Whereas it appears that the producer is paying the processing tax on pork, therefore we urge that our United States Secretary of Agriculture exercise his authority to correct this situation so that the benefits of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration may not be lost to the hog producer.

Resolved, That we ask the Civil Works Administration to revise the wage scale in rural communities so as to enable farmers to compete for hired help.

Believing that direct shipment of hogs to packers is detrimental to the hog-producing interests in Kansas, therefore we urge the Senators and Congressmen from Kansas to exert every effort to have the Packer-Stockyards Act amended in such a manner as to give the Secretary of Agriculture any needed authority in compelling the packers to purchase their supply of hogs on the open market.

We believe the commission, yardage, and feed charges are too high at the public stockyards, and urge that the United States Secretary of Agriculture investigate these charges and take necessary action to reduce them to a more equitable basis.

We favor a lower rate of interest on Government farm loans and the issuance of legal-tender, non-interest-bearing currency to be used to pay the debts of the Nation, eliminating interest-bearing bonds.

Resolved, That we urge upon the local bankers' association the adoption of rules permitting the cashing of pay items to farmers without charge, as cream and produce checks, and in accordance with the principle recognized in the exemption accorded to pay items to workers and the privilege of handling pay rolls without charge.

We urge the continuance of reasonable Federal appropriations for dry-land experiment stations in our Western States, also appropriations to land-grant colleges for extension service and vocational agriculture.

We favor a continuance of the present high standard of efficiency in rural mail service, and are opposed to any curtailment thereof.

FOUR-POINT PROGRAM OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter, with an accompanying paper, received from Otto F. Messner, commander Department of Pennsylvania, American Legion, relating to the Legion's four-point rehabilitation legislation. As Mr. Messner points out, the proposed bill, which has been introduced by my colleague, does not repeal the economy bill, but does broaden the scope of regulations issued by the Veterans' Administration to permit a more liberal construction being placed on claims for pension and compensation.

The four-point plan furthermore clarifies many legal rulings, as, for example, the placing of a defined limit of $100 a month on totally disabled World War veterans, and accepts the 1925 disability ratings, based on occupational disabilities, caused by war service rather than the more rigid ratings of 1933. Hospitalization is made more accessible to disabled veterans, and other minor protection is provided for widows and orphans.

All in all, it is a modest request worthy of our support, and one particular feature of the four-point program is that payments of compensation and pension are not retroactive. The veterans, to my way of thinking, have "done their bit" in contributing toward balancing the Budget by denial of their compensation and pension payments in company with Federal employees and civilian workers, who have been subjected to salary reductions.

There being no objection, the letter, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN LEGION,
DEPARTMENT OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Philadelphia, Pa., December 26, 1933.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am enclosing copy of the proposed bill covering the Legion's four-point program of rehabilitation. This act does not repeal the economy bill, but simply sets out the dictates of the Legion convention insofar as the rehabilitation program is concerned.

It is the desire of the American Legion that at this session of Congress no other act on this subject be introduced.

I would appreciate if you would introduce this act and use every possible influence to see that no other legislation on this subject be introduced.

Sincerely yours,

OTTO F. MESSENER,
Commander Department of Pennsylvania.

A bill to amend Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", and Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes"

Be it enacted, etc., That where, except by fraud, mistake, or misrepresentation, service connection for a disease, injury, or death was on March 19, 1933, established in accordance with section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, whether directly or by virtue of the presumptions therein provided and such service connection has been severed through the application of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress or Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, service connection is hereby reestablished and as to said cases the provisions of the first paragraph of section 200 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, as amended, insofar as they pertain to requirements for service connection, are hereby reenacted: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall be applicable only to those persons who were employed in the active service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918.

SEC. 2. For the purposes of section 1 of this act and Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the rate of compensation for service-connected total disability for World War veterans shall be $100 per month. Where the service-connected disability is partial the monthly compensation shall be a percentage of the compensation that would be payable for total disability, and said percentage of disability shall be determined in accordance with "United States Veterans' Administration Schedule for Rating Disabilities, Second Edition, 1933": Provided, That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized and directed to amend the said schedule so as to increase the rates provided therein to conform as far as practicable with variant 7 of "The Schedule of Disability Ratings, United States Veterans' Bureau, 1925, and Addenda." The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is further authorized to amend the said schedule whenever experience shall indicate the necessity therefor.

The rates of compensation for specific disabilities set forth in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, paragraph II, subparagraphs (k), (l), (m), (n), and (o), promulgated pursuant to the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and any amendments thereto shall be applicable to World War veterans provided for in this act whenever the conditions enumerated therein exist.

Where a World War veteran entitled to service connection under this act or Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, is shown to have had a service-connected active tuberculous disease of a compensable degree, which, in the judgment of the Administrator, has reached a condition of complete arrest, the rate of compensation shall not be less then 50 percent.

SEC. 3. That section 6 of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, as amended by Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, That any World War veteran who was employed in the active military or naval service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, who was not dishonorably discharged, suffering from disability, disease, or defect, who is in need of hospitalization or domiciliary cares, and is unable to defray the necessary expenses therefor (including transportation to and from the Veterans' Administration facility), may be furnished necessary hospitalization or domiciliary care (including transportation) in any Veterans' Administration facility, irrespective of whether the disability, disease, or defect was due to service. The statement of the applicant in such form as may be prescribed by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall be accepted as sufficient evidence of inability to defray necessary expenses."

SEC. 4. Where death of a World War veteran results or has resulted from disease or injury, service connected under the provisions of this act, the surviving widow, child, or children, and/or dependent mother or father, shall be entitled to receive compensation at the rates prescribed in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part I, paragraph IV, and amendments thereto.

Where a World War veteran who was employed in the active military or naval service between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, dies from disease or injury not due to service, compensation shall be payable to the surviving widow and/or child or children, in the same manner and under the conditions and limitations contained in Veterans' Regulation No. 1 (a), part III, promulgated pursuant to Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, pertaining to pension to widows and children of deceased veterans of the Spanish-American War, Boxer rebellion, or Philippine insurrection.

SEC. 5. That the benefits payable to World War veterans under this act and Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, shall be entitled "compensation" and not "pension."

SEC. 6. The provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, and of section 20 of Public, No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, which are inconsistent with this amendatory act, are hereby repealed and modified accordingly.

SEC. 7. This act shall be effective as of the date of enactment, and no retroactive payments shall be made thereunder.

CIVIL WORKS PROJECTS IN SPOKANE AND SEATTLE, WASH.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a telegram from the mayor of Spokane, Wash., also a telegram from the mayor of Seattle, Wash., in which these public officials set forth the necessity for continuing the expenditure of C.W.A. funds in those cities. I think these telegrams give a very clear portrayal of what is happening in that section of the country. I may say that I am wholly and entirely in sympathy with the idea of continuing the expenditure of those funds; and I ask unanimous consent to have the telegrams printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., January 13, 1934.

Hon. HOMER T. BONE,
United States Senate Chamber,
Washington, D.C.:

Spokane has under construction Union Park Trunk Sewer Docket No. 2,708, Manito Trunk Sewer Docket No. 2,450, and Hillyard Trunk Sewer Docket No. 2,456, under supervision of the Civil Works Administration, cost of construction being approximately $750,000. Absolutely necessary that Civil Works Administration program be continued in order that 2,000 men now allocated to city of Spokane for work on these projects will not have to be returned to unemployed relief rolls. Also doubtful if these projects can be completed within time limit now fixed by Civil Works Administration. Several miles of city streets are now excavated for laying of sewer pipe. City has no funds with which to complete these sewers without Civil Works Administration support. Imperative, therefore, that Civil Works Administration continue to furnish funds for completion of these projects and to prevent men being returned to relief rolls.

LEONARD FUNK,
Mayor of City of Spokane.

SEATTLE, WASH., January 14, 1934.

Senator HOMER T. BONE,
Washington, D.C.:

Report that Congress might not provide funds for continuation of civil works causing great uneasiness here. If the Civil Works Administration work is stopped or curtailed, it will mean a real disaster to this city. Whatever business revival has been experienced here has been due entirely to Civil Works Administration. There is no indication that I can see of any other substantial improvement. All work being done here is absolutely necessary. If any great number of these people were discharged, the police situation would become impossible of handling. I believe that it would cause a financial panic in this community. On all sides the opinion is that the Civil Works Administration is the best thing that the Government has yet done to bring about recovery. Speaking for citizens of all classes, I am satisfied that nearly any burden of taxation would be regarded as tolerable by the citizens if they knew it was going to continue the Civil Works Administration. I know of nobody that does not favor present continuation of it and a continuation for several years to come. Private industry cannot absorb these workers. As mayor, I am familiar with the local conditions, and I urge upon you not only to do your best to prevent any stoppage or curtailment, but, if possible, to expand the program. I personally believe it should be doubled. I am of the opinion, and wherever I have made the statement it has been commended, namely, that if industry cannot furnish a job that the Government must.

JOHN F. DORE, Mayor of Seattle.

THE CAUSE OF PEACE—ADDRESS BY J. FRED ESSARY

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I present an address delivered by J. Fred Essary, Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun, over the N.B.C. network on January 15, 1934, on a program sponsored by the Women's International League for Peace and Freedom, on the fifth anniversary of the ratification by the Senate of the Kellogg Pact, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the address was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF J. FRED ESSARY, WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT OF THE BALTIMORE SUN, OVER N.B.C., JANUARY 15, 1934—PROGRAM SPONSORED BY WOMEN'S INTERNATIONAL LEAGUE FOR PEACE AND FREEDOM ON THE FIFTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE RATIFICATION BY THE UNITED STATES SENATE OF THE KELLOGG PACT

If there is any cause arising from human relationship, more profoundly, more vitally important to more people than is the cause of peace, I ask, What in Heaven's name can it be? Of course, there is none, and it would be insane to argue the contrary.

And to my mind it is equally insane to argue that the surest way to peace is to prepare for war. And yet I have heard that argument from high quarters and from low throughout the whole of my lifetime. I have heard it advanced in behalf of every military or naval appropriation made by my own Government, I have heard it advanced by the champions of standing armies and expanding navies wherever there are armies or navies. The reasoning is always the same. Maintain a navy that no power dare challenge, we are told, and no power will challenge it! Maintain an army that will overwhelm and crush any possible aggressor, we are further told, and there will be no aggressor!

The history of the world testifies to the fallacy of such statements. The truth is, one need go no further than the history of the past 20 years to refute them. England's supreme Navy did not keep her out of war. And, tragically enough, our own vast resources in man power and money power and material did not keep us out of war. The ability of a nation to exercise power in terms of soldiers and ships and shot and shell and murderous gas has never and never will afford that nation a guaranty of peace.

Nor is peace to be assured by alliances and balances of power among nations. We had them in 1914. We have them now. They failed 20 years ago, and they will fail again to render war less likely. What they did in actuality was to drag unwilling peoples into a conflict from which some of them shrank as from a deadly pestilence.

And it was because of that failure that I embraced with enthusiasm the Woodrow Wilson proposal for a league of nations. For that same reason I have continued to applaud every alternative scheme of arbitration, conciliation, disarmament, what not, that may have occurred to the mind of man that might lessen the possibility of war. The League, too, might fail, I readily agreed. The other devices might fail, too, but surely they could not fail more wretchedly than has the old system of armed preparedness.

We are celebrating today the anniversary of the Kellogg-Briand Pact. It is another piece of practical idealism, as was the League of Nations; another effort to accomplish by statecraft what militarism has been unable to accomplish. I would not have anyone believe that I believe or that its devoted sponsors believe this measure to be an absolute cure for war. It is nothing of the sort. But it is recognition of the fact that war as an instrument of national policy is an indefensible thing, and to that extent it must have some moral value and must place some moral restraint upon a war-inclined nation.

The further step in the same direction taken by President Roosevelt only a few months ago also has its value. He sought to implement the Kellogg Pact by a further agreement on the part of the signers that they will not permit an armed force to cross the frontier of a neighboring state.

These two proposals, if entered into by all the nations of the world, in good faith, and if carried out in equal good faith, would limit war throughout the world in which we live to civil conflicts. But Senator KING has observed it is something of an anachronism that the Government which originated both movements at this very moment should be engaged in a sweeping increase in its naval armament. We are not only claiming but are giving effect to our right to build up our fleet to the utmost limit of our treaty tonnage.

For what purpose, one may ask? Defense, comes the inevitable answer. Defense against whom, against what? To that question we get no reply that any rational human being can understand. All of which leaves us wondering how much sham there is in statesmenship that proposes Kellogg pacts with one hand and signs gigantic armament appropriation bills with the other.

Now, one more observation, which may seem to some of you, my hearers, to be beside the point, and I am through. It is that war is a hideous thing. It has always been so, its glorifiers notwithstanding. But more hideous than war is war's backwash—the tens of thousands of pitiful victims, the hopelessly maimed, the blind, the bed-ridden invalids, the widows, the orphans—yes; the graves. Not all of us have carried arms, but all of us have seen the human wreckage which arms have wrought.

For the luxury of war we pay an appalling price. It is as inescapable as the flight of time, or the certainty of death. We like to think that all wars in which we ourselves have engaged are worth it, but in our hearts we know that they were not.

TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES—A STUDY BY SENATOR LONERGAN

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I desire to ask that there be printed in the RECORD a study of the subject of tax-exempt securities made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN]. I have examined the study sufficiently to know that it is both important and valuable. I, therefore, ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance and printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT BY SENATOR AUGUSTINE LONERGAN (DEMOCRAT), OF CONNECTICUT, IN SUPPORT OF HIS PROPOSALS TO TAX INCOME OF FUTURE ISSUES OF SECURITIES NOW CLASSED AS EXEMPT

The proposal to impose a tax upon Federal securities and also upon securities of the States and subdivisions thereof, which are now exempt from taxation under the income tax laws of the United States and of the States, is by no means new. For many years, leading tax experts have been studying this problem and at various times have made recommendations that a tax in some form should be levied in order to equitably distribute the tax burden among all classes.

This reform in taxation, however, like many others of vital importance to the Nation, found numerous obstacles to delay progress. Like other reforms which are now being accomplished by the administration, this proposal has had to await the gradual development of a public opinion which welcomed and demanded definite action. I believe that that time has now arrived and that the American people not only favor such reform but actually insist on the same prompt action in accomplishing it as has characterized the Government's activity during the past several months in attacking other important and vital problems.

The present existing feeling among the American people regarding the necessity for a tax on the income from securities now exempt was not born in a day in an attitude of "soaking the rich" but is the result of a gradual development of public consciousness and education on this subject, during the past decade in particular.

On September 23, 1921, former Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon in a report submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives in connection with hearings on House Joint Resolutions 102, 211, 231, and 233 of the Sixty-seventh Congress, first session, went on record in favor of restricting further issues of tax-exempt securities. This report, which states that "the ever-increasing volume of tax-exempt securities (issued for the most part by States and municipalities) represent a grave economic evil, not only by reason of the loss of revenue which it entails in the Federal Government, but also of its tendency to encourage the growth of public indebtedness and to divert capital from productive enterprises", is set forth in full, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, September 23, 1921.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I received your letter of August 27, 1921, enclosing a copy of House Joint Resolution 102, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution of the United States restricting the issue of tax-exempt securities by the Federal Government and States and municipalities, and have noted your request for my opinion with respect to this resolution and the subject in general.

As you know, in my letter of April 30, 1921, to the Chairman of the Commitee on Ways and Means, a copy of which I inclose, I recommended to Congress that it consider the advisability of taking action by statute, or constitutional amendment where necessary, to restrict further issues of tax-exempt securities. The ever-increasing volume of tax-exempt securities (issued for the most part by States and municipalities) represents a grave economic evil, not only by reason of the loss of revenue which it entails to the Federal Government, but also because of its tendency to encourage the growth of public indebtedness and to divert capital from productive enterprises. The issue of tax-exempt securities has a direct tendency to make the graduated Federal surtaxes ineffective and nonproductive because it enables taxpayers subject to surtaxes to reduce the amount of their taxable income by investing it in such securities, and at the same time the result is that a very large class of capital investments escape their just share of taxation.

Of course, the voluntary withdrawal of the tax exemptions from securities to be issued by or under the authority of the Federal Government would require no constitutional amendment, but to do this as to Federal securities alone would unjustly discriminate against the National Government and leave a clear field for the State and local governments. In general, moreover, the policy of the Federal Government has been not to issue its own obligations with exemptions from Federal surtaxes and excess-profits taxes, and the great bulk of the Liberty loans and other war debts have no such exemptions. As to State and municipal securities, I assume it is clear, since the decision in Evans v. Gore (253 U.S. 245), that the sixteenth amendment does not permit the Federal Government to tax income derived from State or municipal securities, and that the only effective means of restricting the further issue of tax-exempt securities by State or municipal governments would be by constitutional amendment. Such an amendment would doubtless meet with considerable opposition on the part of the States, and for that reason, as well as from considerations of equality and fairness, it is the better view, I should say, that any restrictions on the further issue of tax-exempt securities should be mutual and should apply as well to securities issued by the Federal Government as to State and municipal securities. It is important, however, not to lose sight of the real basis for the existing constitutional principle under which securities issued by the State and municipal governments are now held free from taxation by the Federal Government, and Federal securities from taxation by State and local authorities, and at the same time to provide proper safeguards against any possible discrimination in taxation by the Federal Government against State and municipal securities or by the State governments against Federal securities. It is also important, in order to avoid any question of bad faith, that the amendment should not apply to outstanding issues which now enjoy tax exemptions. For these reasons I think that some modifications of House Joint Resolution 102 are desirable.

In the first place, I think that the resolution should be so modified as to make it perfectly clear that the right of the Federal Government to tax the income derived from State and municipal securities and of any State to tax the income derived from Federal securities shall exist only to the same extent that each government taxes the income derived from its own securities. This would prevent any discrimination by either government against the securities issued by the other. In the second place, it is noted that while the first part of the resolution subjecting the income from securities issued by State and municipal governments to taxation by the United States applies only to securities issued after the ratification of the amendment, the proviso subjecting the income from securities issued by the United States, its possessions, and Territories to taxation by the States is not similarly limited. Such a limitation is, of course, necessary. Furthermore, the language of the proviso subjecting income from issues of Federal securities to taxation by the several States is not expressly limited to the income derived from securities held by residents of the State and should be modified so as to avoid any possible interpretation which would allow a State to tax the income derived from Federal securities not held within the State.

I might also suggest that the language of the amendment be made broad enough to include all securities issued by or under the authority of the Federal Government or of any State. This would apply, for example, to securities issued by Federal land banks and other so-called "instrumentalities" of the Federal and State Governments, which might not be considered as coming within the terms of the resolution as it now stands.

In this connection I am taking the liberty of enclosing a draft of a proposed amendment to the Constitution along the lines of House Joint Resolution 102, modified as I have suggested.

Very truly yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

To Hon. LOUIS T. MCFADDEN,
Chairman Committee on Banking and Currency,
House of Representatives.

MAINTAINS FAVORABLE POSITION

Former Secretary Mellon was also on record in various other parts of this same report on the hearings before the Ways and Means Committee on this same legislation.

In a previous report submitted on April 30, 1921, and reported in the hearings, he suggested for the consideration of Congress that it might also be advisable to take action by statute, or by constitutional amendment, where necessary, to restrict further issues of tax-exempt securities. Quoting from this report, Mr. Mellon said:

"It is now the policy of the Federal Government not to issue its own obligations with exemptions from Federal surtaxes and profits taxes, but States and municipalities are issuing fully tax-exempt securities in great volume. It is estimated that there are outstanding perhaps $10,000,000,000 of fully tax-exempt securities. The existence of this mass of exempt securities constitutes an economic evil of the first magnitude. The continued issue of tax-exempt securities encourages the growth of public indebtedness and tends to divert capital from productive enterprise. Even though the exemptions of outstanding securities cannot be disturbed, it is important that future issues be controlled or prohibited by mutual consent of the State and Federal Governments."

Here is a man of great wealth and for many years the head of the Treasury, who would ordinarily be regarded as among the first to go on record against such a policy of taxation if it were true that vast discriminations would be imposed upon wealthy holders of such exempt securities, coming out in favor of such a plan, if reasonably and logically applied, at a time when it was known quite generally that such legislation had little chance of enactment. This same attitude of Mr. Mellon appears in subsequent reports of the Treasury on the tax-exempt question, which will be referred to later, and which will indicate a fairly consistent view on this subject up to the present time.

COOLIDGE ENDORSES PLAN

On December 6, 1923, the late President Calvin Coolidge, in his annual message to Congress (68th Cong., 1st sess. CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 97, pt. 1, vol. 65), said:

"Another reform which is urgent in our fiscal system is the abolition of the right to issue tax-exempt securities. The existing system not only permits a large amount of the wealth of the Nation to escape its just burden but acts as a continual stimulant to municipal extravagance. This should be prohibited by constitutional amendment. All the wealth of the Nation ought to contribute its fair share to the expenses of the Nation."

At about the same time the Treasury Department was again on record on the subject in the following report to Congress:

"One of the most difficult problems the income tax presents is the tax-exempt security question. There are two solutions: First, eliminate the tax-exemption privilege; second, adjust the income-tax rates so that the value of tax exemption as a means of tax avoidance shall be lessened. The first solution requires a constitutional amendment, and its adoption has met with serious political opposition. Also, in the last session of the Congress there was defeated a recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury that a taxpayer should not be permitted to take as a deduction, in figuring his net income, interest paid by him except to the extent it exceeded the tax-exempt interest received by him and which he did not include in his gross income. While the Treasury renews the recommendation made heretofore that a constitutional amendment to reach tax exemption be proposed by the Congress, it feels that the recognition of the necessity for this action by Congress may be delayed and that an immediate remedy should be adopted.

"Fully tax-exempt securities outstanding in the hands of the public now amount to $13,284,000,000 and are increasing at the rate of about $1,000,000,000 a year. The value of a tax-exempt security to a man of large income lies wholly in the fact that the tax-exemption feature gives him more free income than another equally safe investment, part of the return from which the Government takes. Under the present law, if a man has an income of $100,000 and is asked to invest money in some constructive project, the new project must return to him $1.75 for every $1 he would receive from investing the same money in tax-exempt securities. To express this another way, it takes about an 8-percent return on a taxable investment to be equivalent to a 4½-percent return on one that is tax exempt. With higher incomes, the disparity is even greater. If the Treasury's recommendation for a maximum aggregate tax of 31 percent should be adopted, the relative values would be $1.44 to $1, or 6½ percent taxable as compared with 4½ percent exempt. The difference between an investment in ordinary productive business returning 8 percent, the requirement under the present law, and 6½ percent, the requirement under the Treasury rates, to equal a 4½-percent tax-exempt is the difference between a sound investment and a speculative investment. One will be accepted, the other not. If the income-tax rates are reduced to a reasonable figure, the lure of tax-exempt securities to the wealthy becomes less appealing, and many will put their money into business or new projects and be content with less return because it will give them as much free income as would a tax-exempt security. From such investments the Government gets revenue, from tax-exempt securities it gets none. By such investments capital is provided for industry at lower rates, and the appalling increase of State and municipal indebtedness, with its inevitable taxation of the people to pay this indebtedness, is not encouraged.

"The adoption of the solution of the tax-exempt evil by taking from it the wholly artificial attraction of high income taxes on other investments is within the immediate power of the Congress. This would prove advantageous to constructive business and to all who use capital, would remove the incentive for the most notorious avoidance by the wealthy of income taxes, and would assist in accomplishing the purpose of taxation; that is, to raise revenue. A continuation of the high artificial value to this legal means of escape must end or the graduated income tax will cease to be productive. (Italics supplied.)

At about the same time (Nov. 2, 1923), former President Herbert Hoover, who at the time was Secretary of Commerce, filed a report with Hon. Reed Smoot, in the United States Senate, referring to Secretary Mellon's report that $11,000,000,000 of State and municipal securities were in circulation free of income tax and stated: "It is generally believed that these securities are sought after by persons subject to the higher percentage of income tax. Therefore, the very persons best able to bear the burden of taxation are escaping it."

The full text of this report of Mr. Hoover's views at the time as found in a report of the Senate Finance Committee, Sixty-eighth Congress, first session, under date of March 26, 1924, on the question of tax-exempt securities is set forth as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 2, 1923.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR MR. SENATOR: In accordance with your request, I enclose herewith a memorandum opinion by Judge Stephen B. Davis on the power of Congress to impose a special or additional estate tax upon the succession to the portion of an estate which consists of Federal, State, or municipal bonds, the income from which is exempt from Federal income tax. You will see that Judge Davis believes Congress has constitutional power to levy such a tax, subject, perhaps, to the condition that the differentiation in rates of levy be not arbitrary but have some reasonable basis. By such a tax rates can be so adjusted as to effect, through the difference in the amounts which would be exacted from the corpus of the estate, an ultimate approximate equalization between the burdens currently borne by incomes subject to surtaxes and incomes which are not so subject because of investment in securities of a legally privileged nature. Such an ultimate equalization would tend to do away with a great amount of the present successful avoidance of the burdens of Federal taxation.

This plan might, on consideration, develop weaknesses that are not now apparent, but I would like to make some comment on this whole question of tax-exempt securities from the point of view of industry and commerce in support of Secretary Mellon's recommendations.

Secretary Mellon has stated that eleven billions of State and municipal securities are in circulation free of income tax. It is generally believed that these securities are sought after by persons subject to the higher percentages of income tax. Therefore, the very persons best able to bear the burden of taxation are escaping it.

Nor is direct tax exemption of these securities the whole story, for they furnish a wide basis for further avoidance of taxation. For instance, a man may borrow 70 percent on his house (if his other credit is good); he may invest this borrowed sum in tax-exempt securities; under our present income-tax laws he may deduct the interest which he pays on his mortgage from his income and does not have to account for the sum he receives on tax-exempt securities. There appears to have definitely grown up not only this form of avoidance but other forms based on various kinds of interlocking transactions which carry avoidance a great deal further than the actual sum otherwise collectible on tax-exempt securities.

This question has many bearings on productive industry and commerce and many economic as well as social implications.

1. It must be obvious that we are thus thrusting the burden of income taxes upon productive industry and personal effort.

2. Most other countries in the world give special relief in income taxes to business and professional incomes as distinguished from rent and interest as being necessary to maintain the initiative and enterprise of the people. We not only do not give this relief but even a much larger burden upon earned income from business and professions and to offer larger opportunity for avoidance of taxes on so-called "property incomes."

3. Aside from the uneconomic thrust of taxes onto productive activities, there is an inherent injustice in this distribution of the burden from the fact that holders of professional and business incomes must set aside a portion of these incomes to provide for their dependents, whereas persons possessed of rent or interest incomes have by the nature of things already made such provision. Other countries allow a large deduction of amounts paid for insurance premiums. We allow none.

4. Under the tax-exempt provisions States and municipalities are able to borrow money with even lower margins of interest over manufacture and business. The net effect is to increase interest rates in industry and commerce, and this misdirection in the flow of capital tends to increase the prices of every commodity.

5. The collection of estate taxes upon exempt securities does not present the difficulties in payment presented by such taxes upon going business, for these securities are readily marketable. Such a tax increase will also result in a better distribution of estates representing unduly large accumulation.

6. Even though the States be disposed to accept a constitutional amendment on tax-exempt securities, it will take time, and in the meantime further securities will be piling up.

7. What additional tax should be placed upon the portion of the estate composed of exempt securities in order to compensate for the loss of income tax upon them needs careful study. It will probably have to be an empirical figure in any event.

It is an extraordinary thing for a commercial nation like ours to have developed a form of taxation which puts a premium on nonproductivity and a blight on productivity itself. (Italics supplied.)

Yours faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

RECENT TREASURY RECOMMENDATIONS

We find the Secretary of the Treasury again on record on tax-exempt securities in his annual report to the Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1925, with the following statement:

"Looking at the proposition logically, there is no reason for the existence of tax-exempt securities. There ought to be no refuge to which the wealthy man can go and avoid income taxes at times when the Federal Government needs the money. A constitutional amendment to make these securities taxable should be passed. The Treasury has consistently been the advocate of such reform. The delay, however, has been so long and the amount of securities now outstanding, which would not be affected by the amendment, has become so great—it is over $14,000,000,000 now—that the practical way of reaching the present situation seems to be by taking away the artificial advantage of these securities through the reduction of the surtax to a reasonable figure. If you place your surtax at a point where productive business and investments can compete with tax-exempt securities in net return to a wealthy investor, you have solved the present difficulty. It is interesting to note that the First Liberty 3½'s, which alone of the Liberty bonds are wholly tax-exempt, have gone below par for the first time since June 1922, reflecting the view that the expected reduction of surtaxes to a normal figure justifies the wealthy owners of these bonds in selling them to put their money into productive investment. We already are getting results on the mere belief in ultimate tax reform."

Again in 1928, in the annual report of the Treasury for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, Secretary Mellon reported as follows:

"I recommend that the Congress consider an amendment of the Second Liberty Loan Act, as amended, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exempt further issues of securities from the surtax as well as the normal tax.

"The enactment of such an amendment would not interfere with the subsequent adoption of a constitutional amendment permitting the Federal and the State Governments to tax so-called 'tax-exempt securities', should the Congress and the States deem such an amendment desirable. But pending the adoption of such an amendment there is no reason why the Treasury Department in marketing securities should be at a disadvantage as compared with States and their subdivisions, or why there should be discrimination against individual investors who desire to acquire United States Government securities.

"If States and their political subdivisions continue to issue securities which are wholly tax exempt at the rate of a billion dollars a year, the Federal Government should not be limited to the issuance of securities exempt only from the normal income tax. Although the United States securities for individual investors, therefore, do not compare favorably with the yield on State and municipal securities which are issued free from all taxation."

TREASURY POSITION IN 1930

A later and more vigorous recommendation was made by Treasury Secretary Mellon in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, where he says:

"In this connection I renew the recommendation contained in my annual report for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1928, that the Congress consider a further amendment to the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to exempt further issues of securities from the surtax as well as the normal tax. In the act of June 17, 1929, Congress modified the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, by providing that all certificates of indebtedness and Treasury bills issued thereafter should be exempt both as to principal and interest from all taxes, except estate and inheritance taxes. I renew my recommendation that this exemption be extended to bonds. Special legislation is not required in the case of notes, since the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by existing law to make this exemption applicable to notes.

"Some time ago the Treasury Department earnestly recommended the adoption of a constitutional amendment permitting the Federal and State Governments, respectively, to tax securities to be issued in the future, which under present constitutional provision are not taxable. There appears, however, to be no immediate prospect of such an amendment being adopted. Pending its adoption, there is no reason why the Treasury Department, in marketing securities, should be at a disadvantage as compared with States and their subdivisions, or why there should be discrimination against individual investors who desire to acquire United States Government securities. It is idle to argue that the issuance of United States tax-exempt securities would furnish convenient means of income-tax avoidance. As long as the States and their political subdivisions continue to issue securities which are wholly tax exempt at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year there is at all times an ample supply of gilt-edge securities available to those desiring to escape income-tax payment through investment in tax-exempt securities. Limiting the Federal Government to the issuance of securities exempt only from the normal income tax does not result in increased income-tax collections but simply in a higher interest cost to the Government.

"Insofar as individual investors are concerned, the present situation gives rise to discrimination as between them and corporations. Corporations being only subject to the normal tax, United States securities in their hands are completely tax exempt, whereas practically all such securities in the hands of individuals are subject to surtaxes. The yield on United States securities for many individual investors does not, therefore, compare favorably with the yield on State and municipal securities, which are usually wholly free from taxation." (Italics supplied.)

A VIEW ON CONGRESS

From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in 1922, and at other times, we also find excerpts from leading arguments in favor of eliminating tax-exempt securities:

"There is no other country that issues tax-exempt bonds in the same way that we do." (E. D. Chassell, Senate, hearings, p. 78; the Reference Shelf, vol. III, no. 1, p. 112.)

"The owners of great estates are gradually transferring all of their property into tax-exempt securities. It is easy to find men with incomes of over $100,000 who pay not a single cent to the National Treasury, nor to the State, county, or township, while farmers, business men, and others are suffering under the burdensome and oppressive taxes that necessarily prevail today." (William R. Green, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 64, p. 709, Dec. 19, 1922.)

"Tax exemption is a very grave peril, for it undermines the very basis of public revenue and it is a social evil of the first magnitude. It places the greater part of the tax burden upon earned incomes and gives more or less immunity to earned incomes. It diverts capital from productive enterprises and housing into wasteful or deferable governmental enterprises. The present is an emergency of the utmost importance, demanding imperatively a constitutional amendment of the character proposed." (R. C. Leffingwell, House hearings, p. 137; the Reference Shelf, vol. III, no. 1, p. 115.)

"When a man so wealthy, so experienced, and so conservative as Secretary of the Treasury Mellon declares the combination of tax investments and high surtaxes is drying up the sources of industrial capital, placing a premium on Government extravagance, and forcing the less able part of the population to pay double taxes it is time to sit up and pay attention. The situation develops in two ways. Tax-exempt securities offer the wealthy man a field of investment from which he obtains full personal use of his income. At the same time investment in commercial securities is penalized by high income taxes. Two adjacent advertisements in yesterday's financial pages provide an illustration. One offers South Dakota school bonds to pay 5 percent, 'exempt from all Federal income taxes.' Another offers 7-percent bonds to finance a paper mill. If a man with an income of $100,000 or more invests in the paper mill half his 7 percent goes to the Government, leaving him a profit of 3½ percent. Out of the $1,000,000 invested in the mill he would net $35,000. Out of the $1,000,000 invested in school bonds at 5 percent he would net $50,000. Naturally he buys the school bonds. Not only do they pay him more but they face none of the risks of business. That makes it difficult for all commercial enterprises to obtain capital. A Texas country-school district has better credit than the United States Steel Corporation. And at the same time those able to pay the most taxes are tending more and more to escape taxation. Thus the Government's revenue is falling off while local and State governmental debts are increasing and raising taxes for all who pay them." (Chicago Tribune editorial, Feb. 15, 1923.)

THE PRESENT SITUATION

The logic and wisdom of levying a tax on exempt securities has continued with such force down to the present time that the present session of Congress is faced with the necessity of taking some definite affirmative action. There is no escape from this conclusion. The question now is simply one of which course we shall adopt.

In approaching the procedural difficulties I have done so with a full realization and understanding of the present economic situation, as well as numerous decisions of the United States Supreme Court and our Federal courts relating to the constitutionality of imposing a tax on income from certain types of exempt securities. These facts, which will hereafter be discussed in some detail, have led me to the conclusion that Congress will adopt the following course: (1) Enact legislation to amend the revenue laws so that future issues of Federal securities can be taxed; or (2) propose a constitutional amendment granting power to the Federal Government and to the States to tax future issues of all States or subdivisions thereof.

The first step would be easier because it would not require a constitutional amendment, but the benefits would be relatively small, being derived only from future issues of Federal securities and in no way affecting the income from State and local issues. On the other hand, there is some strong opinion that a constitutional amendment in no event is absolutely necessary, and that liberal interpretation by the courts would enable the Government to levy a tax on all types of Federal and local securities as an excise within the prevailing constitutional provisions. Decisions supporting this view will be referred to later.

With these problems in mind I have introduced two bills, the first of which, S. 1892 (73d Cong., 1st sess.), makes incomes from United States securities subject to the income-tax laws of the United States. This measure is set forth as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding any other provisions of law, all income derived from securities issued after the date of enactment of this act, by or under the authority of the United States, shall be included in gross income within the meaning of section 22 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 for the purposes of taxation under title I of such act, and shall also be subject to taxation under all income-tax laws of the United States hereafter enacted."

The second measure is Senate Joint Resolution No. 61, which proposes an amendment to the Constitution giving power to the Federal Government and to the States to levy and collect taxes on income derived by States or subdivisions thereof. This resolution is set out as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three fourths of the several States, which conventions shall be composed in each State of delegates elected by a majority vote of the electors of the State voting at such election:

"ARTICLE —

"SECTION 1. The United States shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived from securities issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of any State, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of the United States or any other State.

"SEC. 2. Each State shall have power to lay and collect taxes on income derived by its residents from securities issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of the United States, but without discrimination against income derived from such securities and in favor of income derived from securities issued after the ratification of this article by or under the authority of each State."

If a constitutional amendment is adopted, this, of course, will be more complete in its result and will leave no apparent questions for the courts to decide. Moreover, it will give the States an opportunity to pass upon this vital question, so that we can determine exactly where they stand. In my opinion the States would vote for a constitutional amendment giving the Federal Government and the States the power to tax Government securities.

It is roughly estimated that approximately $35,000,000,000 of all classes of tax-exempt securities are extant today. If taxes were now being collected against these securities it is estimated that $160,000,000 additional revenue would be flowing into the Treasury each year. This sum would aid greatly in keeping down or reducing the tax burden which the rest of the wealth of the country and the people who pay income taxes are compelled to bear today.

EXEMPTIONS COMPILED

The last available compilation of tax-exempt securities in the United States is for the year ending December 31, 1931. At that time, the following totally exempt or partially exempt securities of various classes were outstanding:

U.S. Government bonds, etc., totally exempt from normal as well as surtax	$5,011,000,000
Territorial bonds and securities, totally exempt	153,000,000
United States Government Federal farm-loan securities, totally exempt	1,789,000,000
United States Government issues which are exempt from normal tax only	12,125,000,000
Total, both classes	19,078,000,000
To the above figures are added the securities of the States, counties, cities, and school districts, which were outstanding on Dec. 31, 1931. These securities, totally exempt from Federal or State tax, totaled	15,583,000,000
Grand total for all classes	34,661,000,000

By deducting the figure of $12,125,000,000, representing issues exempt from the normal tax only, we had a total of $22,536,000,000 in securities of all classes outstanding on December 31, 1931, which were totally exempt from taxation for income.

Realizing that much of this investment might shift to other securities if the tax-exempt privilege were removed, there is no accurate basis for estimating revenue which might be produced at current rates if these securities could now be taxed, but if the current rates were applied to the entire sum by Federal, State, and city governments alike, the revenue would be around $160,000,000 annually.

OPPOSE RETROACTIVE TAX

Any proposal to tax these securities now outstanding by a retroactive provision would not be favored in most quarters, and, moreover, would raise another complicating legal problem based upon the constitutionality of such retroactive provisions. It seems advisable, therefore, to adopt a reform measure which only contemplates the taxation of future issues of securities and which makes adequate provision for imposing such a tax upon renewal or exchange of outstanding obligations for new.

Although, so far as I can determine, there is no United States Supreme Court decision on the question, some courts, in collateral statements and dicta, have indicated that the renewal or exchange of outstanding Government bonds or obligations would not be "new issues", taxable as "future issues", within the meaning of the contemplated constitutional amendment or amendment to the revenue act. It is indicated that so long as the outstanding obligations were callable within the provisions of the contract, their retirement, with voluntary acceptance by the holder of a new issue in exchange, would permit taxation on the new obligation as a "future issue." If the exchange were mandatory, however, this would amount to repudiation of the previous obligation and substitution of a new contract subject to the tax, and would be the same in effect as applying the tax provisions retroactively to the income of all outstanding securities.

It will be necessary, therefore, to legally provide for the collection of a tax on income for the present securities which may be called in for renewal or exchange.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE ACTION

As this statement is being prepared, I am informed that a subcommittee of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, Seventy-third Congress, second session, has completed a thorough study of revenue legislation, including a study of tax-exempt securities, and has made the following recommendation:

"Your subcommittee deliberated at length in regard to the question of making all tax-exempt income taxable, but came to the conclusion that the only proper way to handle the subject in its broad aspect was through an amendment to the Constitution."

RECOMMENDATION OF MR. L. H. PARKER

With reference to the above recommendations of the subcommittee, Mr. L. H. Parker, Chief of Staff of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, today submitted to me the following statement outlining his personal views regarding the proper form of taxation if such recommendation is followed:

"If the general conclusion of the subcommittee is concurred in that this form of income should be made taxable through a constitutional amendment, then the important elements of such a plan may be properly considered.

"First, it seems obvious that all such interest should be equally subject to tax, whether the source be Federal, State, county, municipal, or township bonds. Otherwise, certain bonds will be preferred over others, and the interest rates, resulting from such a condition, unequal and unfair.

"Second, if all such interest is made subject to both normal and surtax in the hands of the individual and to the corporate income tax, the following questions need careful consideration:

"1. Will the taxes imposed substantially increase the interest paid on all future obligations?

"2. Will the rate on the bonds of small local communities be increased more than the rate on Federal, State, and city bonds?

"3. Will Federal, State, and local bonds find a sufficiently ready market in times of emergency?

"4. Will the bond market collapse when the passage of such a constitutional amendment becomes assured?

"Many will undoubtedly answer the first, second, and fourth questions above in the affirmative, and third in the negative. If such answers are correct, the whole proposition seems of doubtful merit. However, in the writer's opinion, the danger arising from these four propositions can be undoubtedly avoided by providing that all interest from Federal, State, and local bonds be subject to surtax but not to normal tax or corporate tax.

"It appears, since about 67 percent of these bonds are held by corporations and only 33 percent by individuals, that the following advantages might be claimed for such a plan:

"1. There will be a negligible increase in interest rates, since banks and other corporations, being the largest buyers, will set such rates.

"2. Corporate stockholders will not be affected differently than at present, since under existing law tax-exempt interest loses its exempt character in passing through the hands of the corporation; that is, the dividends from a corporation, all of whose income is from tax-exempt interest, are taxable to the stockholders at surtax rates.

"3. Small communities will be able to find purchasers for their bonds, since the banks generally take these issues, and such banks under the suggested plan would not be taxed except indirectly on the dividends declared to the stockholders.

"4. A sufficiently ready market would still exist, since individuals with small incomes and corporations would still be free from tax on this form of income.

"5. No enormous volume of securities would flood the market in anticipation of the constitutional amendment, making financing of public projects impossible during such a period.

"6. Nevertheless, the proposal would result in imposing the full surtax rate on the incomes of our wealthier citizens who choose this form of investment and have ability to pay substantial taxes.

"While the gross revenue from this proposal, to apply the surtax only, would be less than from applying normal, surtax, and corporate tax, it is believed that the net result would not be greatly different, on account of the increased interest rate which would probably result in the latter case.

"The above comments have been prepared rather hastily, but it is hoped that they may be of some value in your consideration of this subject."

L. H. PARKER, Chief of Staff.

COMMITTEE MEMORANDUM

In addition to the above statement, Mr. Parker also inserted in the hearings of the Ways and Means subcommittee the following memorandum on wholly and partially tax-exempt interests, which I regard as extremely important in connection with the technical and legal phases of the question:

MEMORANDUM ON WHOLLY AND PARTIALLY TAX-EXEMPT INTEREST

"Much attention recently has been given to the question of whether the interest on Federal, State, and local bonds should be subject to taxation by the Federal and State Governments. A consideration of the facts in connection with the subject does not lead to an obvious conclusion. However, such facts as seem most important will be pointed out, and certain suggestions made in connection with the matter as appear to warrant consideration.

"The total interest-bearing indebtedness of the Federal, State, and local Governments is estimated to be approximately $40,500,000,000 at this time. The annual interest charge on this amount is estimated to be approximately $1,805,000,000. The larger part of this latter sum is entirely free from Federal and State income taxes, although it is true that some of the Federal bonds are subject to surtaxes. Also, practically all of the bonds are subject to estate and inheritance taxes, and to the income tax insofar as a profit is realized upon the sale thereof.

"Naturally we have accurate figures as to the total amount of Federal securities. On August 31, 1933, the total interest-bearing debt of the United States outstanding amounted to $22,722,597,530, of which amount $12,860,055,350 was subject to surtax and $9,862,542,180 was wholly tax exempt as to both income and surtax. It appears that the average annual interest charge on this Federal debt will be approximately $825,000,000, indicating an average interest rate of approximately 3⅝ percent.

"From incomplete data available this office estimates the present State and local indebtedness to be about $17,800,000,000. The annual interest charge on this sum is probably not less than $980,000,000, indicating an average interest rate of 5½ percent.

"Our revenue acts provide that taxpayers, both individual and corporate, shall report the interest received from these wholly or partially tax-exempt bonds. There is no penalty for not so reporting the wholly tax-exempt interest, and there might be some question as to the legality of such a penalty. In any event, it seems certain that a very considerable amount of the wholly tax-exempt interest is not reported on the returns. This, of course, makes no difference in our present revenue, but is disturbing when we make a statistical study of this question.

"It has already been pointed out that our present annual interest charge on the total Federal, State, and local debt will amount to approximately $1,805,000,000. In 1930 this interest charge amounted to considerably less—probably to about $1,370,000,000. Nineteen hundred and thirty is the latest year on which we have complete income-tax statistics, and in this year we can account for the following amounts of wholly or partially tax-exempt interest on the income-tax returns:

(1) Individuals with net income of $5,000 and over:
Interest on State and local bonds	$172,841,118
Interest on wholly exempt United States bonds	51,308,177
Interest on partially exempt United States bonds (including farm-loan bonds)	38,133,605
Subtotal	262,282,900
(2) Corporations—all:
Interest on Federal, State, and municipal bonds	536,260,563
(3) Individuals with $5,000 gross but no net income:
Interest on partially exempt Government bonds	5,738,139
Grand total	804,281,602

"It is apparent, therefore, that the actual figures on the 1930 income-tax returns account for only $804,281,602 out of a total of probably $1,370,000,000 of wholly or partially tax-exempt interest paid out in that year. While we can account for some of this difference of $566,000,000 as going to the individuals with net incomes of less than $5,000, to tax-exempt corporations, and to foreign individuals and corporations, it must be admitted that the larger portion of the difference probably is the result of the tax-exempt interest not being reported on the returns. However, our figures seem sufficiently complete to form a basis for estimates.

"Before speculating, however, as to how much revenue may be derived from the taxation of this interest, it will be necessary and interesting to observe the distribution of this kind of interest among our smaller taxpayers, our middle class, and our wealthy class. This distribution need be made only for individuals, since the corporate rate of tax is constant while the individual rates of tax are graduated. Furthermore, it can be computed from the figures already given that the corporations appear to hold about 67 percent of the total of Federal, State, and local obligations.

"The wholly and partially tax-exempt interest reported by individuals with net incomes of over $5,000 has been computed for the years 1924, 1927, 1929, and 1930. This interest has been broken up into two groups: (1) United States securities and Federal farm-loan bonds; and (2) State and local obligations. The interest derived from each of these groups has been further classified so as to show the amount received in each case by individuals with net incomes of over $5,000 and not over $25,000, by individuals with net incomes of over $25,000 but not over $100,000, and by individuals with net incomes of over $100,000. These facts are shown in the following four tables covering, respectively, the 4 years already named:

Wholly and partially tax-exempt interest reported by individuals with net incomes of over $5,000 by net income classes

Year	Net income class	United States securities and Federal farm-loan bonds	Percent of total	State and local obligations	Percent of total	Total
1924	$5,000-$25,000	$41,530,723	65	$22,295,874	35	$63,826,597
	$25,000-$100,000	42,885,531	48	46,548,494	52	89,434,025

1929	$5,000-$25,000	32,222,421	53	29,018,872	47	61,241,293
	$25,000-$100,000	31,244,723	37	54,317,645	63	85,562,368
	Over $100,000	36,920,846	30	86,216,837	70	123,137,683
	Total	100,387,990	37	169,553,354	63	269,941,344
1930	$5,000-$25,000	33,133,796	46	38,589,450	54	71,723,246
	$25,000-$100,000	30,699,843	33	61,954,130	67	92,653,973
	Over $100,000	25,608,143	26	72,297,538	74	97,905,681
	Total	89,441,782	34	172,841,118	66	262,282,900

"The following facts may readily be noted from the above tables:

"First. The interest received, and hence the amount of Federal securities held, by all our individual taxpayers with net incomes of over $5,000 has steadily declined. In 1924 the interest received amounted to about one hundred and twenty million; in 1927, to about one hundred and fifteen million; in 1929, to about one hundred million; and in 1930, to about eighty-nine million, a decline of 30 percent from 1924 to 1930.

"Second. The interest received, and hence the amount of State and local obligations held, by all our individual taxpayers with net incomes of over $5,000 has somewhat increased. In 1924 the interest received amounted to about one hundred and nineteen million; in 1927, to about one hundred and fifty-two million; in 1929, to about one hundred and seventy million; and in 1930, to about one hundred and seventy-three million, an increase of 45 percent from 1924 to 1930.

"Third. The class of taxpayers with net incomes of from $5,000 to $25,000 do not find the Federal bonds unattractive. In 1924, 65 percent of their interest was received from such bonds and 35 percent from State and local bonds, while in 1930 the Federal interest received amounted to 46 percent and the State and local interest to 54 percent.

"Fourth. In the case of the middle class of taxpayers with net incomes between $25,000 and $100,000 the proportion of Federal to State and local interest received is much less than in the smaller class and the shift to State and local investment greater. For instance, in 1924, of the total interest received by this class, 48 percent came from Federal securities and 52 percent from State and local obligations, while in 1930, 33 percent came from the former source and 67 percent from the latter.

"Fifth. In the case of the wealthy taxpayers, with net incomes of over $100,000, the unattractiveness of the Federal issues becomes even more pronounced and the shift to State and local issues still greater. In 1924 this class received 42 percent of their total interest from Federal securities and 58 percent from State and local obligations. In 1930, however, 26 percent came from Federal sources and 74 percent from State and local sources.

"It is our conclusion from the above facts that the small taxpayer finds Federal bonds quite as attractive as State and local bonds, because the greater security offered by the former offsets the higher interest rate of the latter. In the case of the larger taxpayers, however, we are forced to the conclusion that State and local issues are preferred over Federal issues, not because this class of taxpayers desire less security, but because the State and local issues are entirely free from surtax, while the majority of the Federal bonds are subject to such tax.

"What additional revenue could be secured by subjecting all this interest on the public debt to tax? Based on the data available and the existing tax rates, we believe the maximum revenue which the Federal Government could obtain would not exceed $160,000,000 annually. Of this amount, about $90,000,000 would come from individuals and about $70,000,000 from corporations.

"A study of the market quotations on Government bonds indicates that the wholly tax-exempt securities are slightly preferred over the partially exempt securities. This is true in spite of the fact that both classes of securities are wholly tax exempt when in the hands of corporations. Thus, a broad tax-free market is now open to corporations for the bonds which are only partially tax exempt in the hands of individuals. If this were not the case, authorities seem to agree that future bond issues by our governmental units would necessarily bear a higher interest rate.

"An increase in interest rate of one fourth of 1 percent on $40,000,000,000 would cost our Government $100,000,000 annually; an increase of one half of 1 percent would cost $200,000,000 annually. Of course, the increase in interest costs would not take effect immediately if Congress taxed bonds already issued in tax-exempt form without retirement and reissue. However, to do so would raise a serious question of breach of faith and might be construed to violate the Constitution.

"At the present time, substantial revenue could be secured by taxing the interest on all Federal, State, and local bonds if the income tax were applied to old as well as new issues. The question of whether such a procedure is right or wrong from a moral standpoint is one which is beyond the scope of this memorandum.

"It is the opinion of this office that if the income tax were applied in full to all future issues of these bonds the increased interest cost would nearly offset the additional revenue secured.

"SUGGESTIONS

"If it is desired to subject all Federal, State, and local bonds to the income tax of both Federal and State Governments, it appears that the fairest way, and the only one free from legal uncertainties, would be to present the issue to the people through an amendment to the Constitution.

"It is suggested that for present purposes it might be well for the Congress to consider the advisability of making all future issues of Federal interest-bearing obligations subject to the surtax. This would restrict the opportunity now existing for the avoidance of this tax. In fact, much might be said, even in the case of a constitutional amendment, in favor of making the interest on Federal, State, and local bonds subject to surtaxes but not to normal taxes. It would have the effect of preventing tax avoidance without materially increasing the interest rate.

"There is some possibility, in view of certain decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that even under existing law interest on governmental bonds can be reached by an excise tax in the case of individuals or corporations carrying on business. This question is discussed in the appended memorandum prepared by Mr. Stam, counsel to this committee.

"As already stated, no obvious conclusion is apparent in connection with this matter. It is a subject of importance, and needs further investigation and study. (Italics supplied.)

"Respectfully,

"L. H. PARKER, Chief of Staff."

POWER OF CONGRESS TO TAX TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

EXCISE TAX

Many proposals have been submitted suggesting the taxation by the Federal Government of the income received from State and municipal securities. It is settled doctrine that without a constitutional amendment Congress has no power directly to tax the income received from State and municipal securities (Metcalf and Eddy v. Mitchell, Admx., 269 U.S. 514, 521; Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U.S. 429; National Life Insurance Co. v. U.S., 48 Sup. Ct. 593). However, there is a possibility that such income might be reached through an excise tax measured by the net income from all sources. In the case of corporations, it seems clear that this can be done. The corporation-excise tax of 1909 taxed the privilege of carrying on or doing business by corporations. The tax was measured by the net income of the corporation from all sources. Since the subject of the tax was an exercise of a franchise or privilege, the Supreme Court held that Congress had the power to include in the measure of the tax the income from tax-exempt securities, although such income could not be directly taxed (Stone Tracy Co. v. Flint, 220 U.S. 107). Moreover, some of the States, through corporation-excise taxes, are now taxing the income from Federal securities by measuring the excise by the net income of the corporation from all sources. In at least two of the States, namely, California and New York, their power to do this has been upheld by the Supreme Court (Pacific Co. v. Johnson, 285 U.S. 480; Educational Films Co. v. Ward, 282 U.S. 379). In the California case the Supreme Court made the following statement as to this point:

"The owner may enjoy his exempt property free of tax, but if he asks and receives from the State the benefit of the taxable privilege as the implement of that enjoyment, he must bear the burden of the tax which the State exacts as its price.

"So far as individuals are concerned, there is a possibility that the income received by them from tax-exempt securities may also be reached through an excise. To do this we must first find a taxable privilege upon which to base the excise. It seems clear that all trades, avocations, and employments by which individuals acquire a livelihood may be made the subject of an excise or privilege tax. (See the Stone Tracy and Pollock cases, cited above.) Accordingly, if Congress levied an excise on individuals engaged in any business, occupation, trade, avocation, or employment, it seems entirely possible that such tax could be measured by the net income of the individual from all sources, including the income from tax-exempt securities. As stated by the Supreme Court in the Stone Tracy Co. case, 'there is no rule which permits a court to say that the measure of a tax for the privilege of doing business, where income from property is the basis, must be limited to that derived from property used in the business.' It is up to Congress to determine the measure of the excise, and it seems entirely possible that the measure of such excise could be the net income of the individual from all sources, including tax-exempt securities.

"Under this proposed scheme there would be three taxes levied by the Congress: (1) An excise tax upon the carrying on or doing business by corporations measured by the net income from all sources; (2) an excise tax upon individuals engaged in any trade, occupation, avocation, or employment, measured by the net income from all sources; and (3) a net-income tax imposed upon all individuals and corporations not subject to the excise tax.

"By this scheme most of the income from tax-exempt securities could be reached. Those persons that would escape would be only those who do not engage in any trade, avocation, or employment, but merely hold securities. This scheme would also not extend to State employees engaged in governmental functions of the State, for such occupations being governmental in character could not be reached even through an excise.

"COLIN F. STAM, Counsel."

LEGAL OPINION OF DAVID M. WOOD

In addition to the statement of Mr. Stam, I quote from an opinion by Mr. David M. Wood, of New York:

"The Constitution of the United States nowhere expressly declares that Congress has no power to tax the bonds of the States or of their subdivisions, or the income derived from such bonds. It is, however, equally silent regarding the power of the States to tax the bonds of the United States and the income derived from those bonds. The limitations upon the powers of Congress and of the State legislatures with respect to such taxation, therefore, if they exist at all, are implied limitations, and the intention to impose such limitations must be determined from a study of the entire Constitution and its historical background.

"When, as a result of the American Revolution, the Thirteen Colonies achieved their independence from Great Britain they became 13 independent nations, each jealous of its own sovereignty and suspicious and distrustful of its neighbors. Men at that time did not consider themselves Americans. They were Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers, etc. No idea of national unity at that time existed except in the minds of a few remarkable men. At length, however, the necessity for a Federal Union of these 13 independent nations became apparent, and a convention was assembled which undertook the drafting of a Federal Constitution. The representatives of no State in this convention, however, had any intention of surrendering the sovereignty of their State to the new Federal Government which they hoped to set up, and yet it was necessary to vest in the new Government the attributes of sovereignty. The result was a compromise. The States delegated to the Federal Government some of their sovereign powers and reserved all others to themselves. Thus arose a system of dual sovereignty which has prevailed in this country ever since.

"The Federal Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. The Federal Government, in its sphere, is supreme, but the States, within the limits of the powers which they have not granted to the Federal Government, are as independent of it as that Government, within its sphere, is independent of the States.

FEDERAL TAXING POWERS LIMITED

"Of necessity, the Federal Government had to be granted the power of taxation, but certain limitations were imposed upon the exercise of that power. All direct taxes were prohibited, unless levied in proportion to the census, which the Constitution directed to be taken. This limitation should be remembered as it is one which affects the question under discussion. The States, however, reserved to themselves the power of taxation for State and local purposes. Thus it is quite possible for the States and the Federal Government to levy taxes upon the same source of revenue. Conflicts in the exercise of these respective taxing powers were almost inevitable, and the courts had occasion to decide cases arising out of these conflicts almost immediately after the establishment of the Federal Government.

"Chief Justice Marshall, in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316), pointed out that, if the States possessed the power to tax the Federal Government, or the means or instrumentalities through which it exercised its constitutional powers, the Federal Government would be subordinate to the States. He declared the power to tax was the power to destroy, and that if it were conceded that the States possessed the power to tax the Federal Government or its governmental instrumentalities, they could impede, if not destroy, the Federal Government. To maintain the supremacy of the Federal Government, within its appropriate sphere, as the Constitution clearly intended, Chief Justice Marshall rendered his famous decision in McCulloch v. Maryland, that the States had no power, by taxation or otherwise, to impede, burden, or in any manner control the operation of the laws enacted by Congress to carry into effect the powers vested in the Federal Government.

"Applying the principle announced in this decision, the same Court, in the case of Western v. Charleston (2 Pet. 449), held that an ordinance of the city of Charleston, S.C., attempting to tax securities issued by the United States, was unconstitutional. The Court pointed out that such a tax would inevitably fall upon the borrower, and that, in reality, it would be a tax upon the exercise of the power of the Federal Government to borrow money; in short, a tax upon the United States Government itself. That decision has been repeatedly followed by the Federal courts as well as by the courts of the various States.

EARLY DECISIONS NEVER SERIOUSLY QUESTIONED

"But it is equally true to admit the power of the Federal Government to tax the States or the means or agencies through which they exercise their sovereign powers would subordinate the States to the Federal Government, which, likewise, was not intended by the framers of the Constitution. It follows, therefore, as a necessary corollary to the decisions in McCulloch v. Maryland and Weston v. Charleston that the United States cannot tax the governmental functions of the States. Accordingly we find the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Collector v. Day (11 Wall. 113) and in the United States v. Railroad Co. (17 Wall. 322), holding that the United States could not levy taxes upon bonds issued by an instrumentality of State government. These decisions likewise have not been seriously questioned since they were rendered generations ago.

INCOME TAX LAW OF 1894

"In the year 1894, however, Congress passed a law providing for the taxing of income, including income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, or other securities, except certain bonds of the United States. It was contended that, while the bonds issued by the States or their instrumentalities of government could not be taxed by Congress, there was no reason why it could not tax the income derived from these bonds. The validity of this law was considered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co. (157 U.S. 429). Chief Justice Fuller, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

"'We think the same want of power to tax the property or revenues of the States or their instrumentalities exists in relation to a tax on the income from their securities * * * it is obvious that taxation on the interest therefrom would operate on the power to borrow before it is exercised, and would have a sensible influence on the contract, and that the tax in question is a tax on the power of the States and their instrumentalities to borrow money, and consequently repugnant to the Constitution.'

"The income-tax law of 1894 was held unconstitutional in this same case on still another ground. I have referred to the fact that the Constitution required an apportionment among the States, based upon the census, of any direct taxes levied by Congress. In the Pollock case the Court held that an income tax was a direct tax and as the tax had not been apportioned among the several States in proportion to the census it was unconstitutional.

NECESSITY FOR THE SIXTEENTH AMENDMENT

"This decision rendered the levy of income taxes by the Federal Government impracticable until the ratification of the sixteenth amendment, which provides as follows:

"'The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes on incomes from whatever source derived, without apportionment among the several States and without regard to any census or enumeration.'

"Upon the ratification of this amendment, indeed before it was ratified, it was contended that its effect would be to vest in Congress the power to levy taxes upon the income derived from State and municipal bonds, but when the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion to consider the effect of the amendment, it declared that it merely removed the requirement for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid upon income. Justice Van Devanter in Evans v. Gore (253 U.S. 245) said:

"'Thus the genesis and words of the amendment unite in showing that it does not extend the taxing power to new or excepted subjects, but merely removes all occasion otherwise existing for an apportionment among the States of taxes laid on income, whether derived from one source or another.'

"If the effect of the sixteenth amendment was not to extend the taxing power of Congress to new or excepted subjects, then it did not confer upon Congress power to tax the income from State and municipal securities, for such income had been excepted from the taxing power of the Federal Government.

NATIONAL LIFE CASE

"The Supreme Court of the United States has never had occasion to pass upon the constitutionality of an act of Congress attempting directly to tax income derived from State or municipal bonds, but in National Life Insurance Co. v. United States (277 U.S. 508) it was called upon to consider whether the effect of a statutory computation of deductions was to impose a tax upon the income of State and municipal securities. It held that the act did indirectly impose a tax upon such income and that insofar as it affected State and municipal bonds it was unconstitutional. Justice McReynolds, in delivering the opinion of the Court, said:

"'It is settled doctrine that directly to tax the income from securities amounts to taxation of the securities themselves (North- western Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Wisconsin, 275 U.S. 136). Also that the United States may not tax State or municipal obligations.'

"In Willcuts v. Bunn (282 U.S. 216) Chief Justice Hughes said:

"'The well-established principle is invoked that a tax upon the instrumentalities of the States is forbidden by the Federal Constitution, the exemption resting upon necessary implication in order effectively to maintain our dual system of government. The familiar aphorism is "that if the means and instrumentalities employed by the General Government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are exempt from taxation by the States, so are those of the States exempt from taxation by the General Government" (Ambrosini v. United States, 1, 7). And a tax upon the obligations of a State or of its political subdivisions falls within the constitutional prohibition as a tax upon the exercise of the borrowing power of the State. * * *

"'In the case of the obligations of a State or of its political subdivisions, the subject held to be exempt from Federal taxation is the principal and interest of the obligations. Pollock v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., supra. These obligations constitute the contract made by the State, or by its political agency pursuant to its authority, and a tax upon the amounts payable by the terms of the contract has, therefore, been regarded as bearing directly upon the exercise of the borrowing power of the Government. In Weston v. Charleston (2 Pet. 449, 468, 469), where the tax, laid under an ordinance of the city council upon United States stock which had been issued for loans made to the United States, was held invalid, the principle was thus stated by Chief Justice Marshall: "The right to tax the contract to any extent, when made, must operate upon the power to borrow before it is exercised and have a sensible influence on the contract. The extent of this influence depends on the will of a distinct government. To any extent, however inconsiderable, it is a burden on the operations of government * * *. The tax on Government stock is thought by this Court to be a tax on the contract, a tax on the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and consequently to be repugnant to the Constitution." This language was applied by the Court in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., supra (157 U.S. at p. 586) in holding invalid Federal taxation "on the interest" from municipal securities.'" (Italics mine.)

OTHER RECENT CASES

"In Indian Motorcycle Co. v. United States (283 U.S. 570) Justice Van Devanter said, at page 576:

"'It has been adjudged that bonds of the United States issued to raise money for governmental purposes, and the interest thereon, are immune from State taxation, because such a tax, even though inconsiderable in amount and imposed only on holders of the bonds, would burden the exercise by the United States of its powers to borrow money. * * * And this immunity has been held to include bonds of a municipal corporation in a territory issued to raise money for municipal purposes, the decision being put on the ground that such a corporation is an instrumentality of the United States exercising delegated governmental powers. * * * It also has been adjudged that bonds of municipal corporations in the several States, issued to raise money for public municipal purposes, and the interest thereon, are immune from Federal taxation, and this on the ground that such corporations are representatives of the States and exercise some of their powers, and that under the implications of the Constitution the governmental agencies and operations of the States have the same immunity from Federal taxation that like agencies and operations of the United States have from taxation by the States.'" (Italics mine.)

"In Educational Films Corporation v. Ward (282 U.S. 379), Mr. Justice Stone declared that, 'this Court, since McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316) has consistently held that the instrumentalities of either government, or the income derived from them, may not be made the direct object of taxation by the other * * *' (Italics mine.)

REVERSAL OF DECISIONS NOT PROBABLE

"To my mind it is inconceivable that the Supreme Court of the United States would reverse a long line of decisions extending from John Marshall's time down almost to the present date, and sustain, as constitutional, an act of Congress levying a tax on the income derived from State and municipal securities. The recent opinions, above quoted, clearly indicate that the court would hold such an act unconstitutional. Indeed, were it to do otherwise, it would open a Pandora's box of evils. If Congress is not prohibited by the Constitution from taxing the income from State and municipal bonds, then the States are not prohibited from taxing the income derived from bonds issued by the Federal Government. The consequences of such a decision would be very far-reaching, but I do not intend to indulge in needless speculation upon them, as I am firmly convinced that it would never be rendered.

"Lest I be misunderstood, let me make it perfectly clear that I have been discussing taxes levied by Congress directly upon the income derived from State and municipal securities. Such securities, and the income derived therefrom, may be made, indirectly, the subject of taxation, as, for instance, through the levy of inheritance taxes, or corporation franchise taxes, etc. An inheritance tax is not a tax upon the security, but upon the right to inherit, and it may be measured by the value of the inheritance, notwithstanding the fact that the property passing may consist wholly of tax-exempt securities. Likewise franchise taxes have been sustained, which are measured by the corporate income, including income from tax-exempt securities. Such taxes are taxes upon the right to exercise the corporate franchise, and are not taxes upon the securities themselves. Other forms of excise taxes exist or may hereafter be devised, which may, indirectly, affect State and municipal securities. These taxes, however, are not within the scope of this opinion.

"If the taxation of income from State and municipal bonds is desirable, the remedy lies in a constitutional amendment. In that way the extent to which such taxation might be permitted could be definitely fixed; and the desired result could be accomplished without endangering the existence of the dual system of government, which, with all its frictions and imperfections, has worked remarkably well.

UNDER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT OUTSTANDING AS WELL AS NEW BONDS COULD BE TAXED

"The question is sometimes asked whether, under such a constitutional amendment, Congress could tax the income of outstanding State and municipal bonds, or whether it would be limited to taxation of income from bonds issued after the ratification of the amendment. The answer to that question would depend upon the terms of the amendment. There is nothing to prevent the amendment of the Constitution so as to confer upon Congress the power to tax the income from all outstanding State and municipal bonds. Indeed Congress might be authorized to tax the bonds themselves. That would not amount to a breach of contract on the part of the Federal Government. The Federal Government has entered into no contract with the holders of State and municipal bonds to refrain from taxing them or the income derived from them. The only contract which exists is between the State, or municipality, which issued the instrument and the holder, a contract to which the United States is not a party. The reason taxes are not now levied by Congress upon income derived from such securities is only because of the fact that the taxing power of Congress does not extend to that subject, and not because of any contract made by the United States with the holder of the bonds to refrain from taxing them, or the income derived from them.

"Whenever the people of the United States determine to vest in Congress, by constitutional amendment, the power to tax State and municipal bonds or the income derived therefrom, Congress will possess that power to whatever extent the people grant it, but, until such a constitutional amendment is ratified, Congress possesses no power to tax the income derived from bonds issued by the States or by their municipalities or political subdivisions."

SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDATION

As a result of the hearing by the Ways and Means Subcommittee a report will no doubt be submitted to the House with regard to the tax-exempt securities question. There is a difference of opinion in the committee, just as there is a difference of opinion among all experts or persons interested in this subject. Sooner or later it will become the duty of the Senate to decide this all-important question, either in connection with revenue legislation which comes over from the House or by original legislation in the Senate. There may be, of course, some Presidential recommendation on this subject before the present session terminates which, of course, would influence the course that it follows.

It is my impression that the Senate should take immediate action and go on record on the tax-exempt securities proposal; and inasmuch as the issue is now before us I personally favor the advancement of a constitutional amendment, as provided by pending resolutions. If we are to solve this all-important problem, we might as well do it constitutionally, logically, and completely.

If, however, the Senate should feel that there is sufficient legal justification for the imposition of an excise tax on income from Federal securities and from State and local securities, the course of action would lie in amending the present internal revenue laws. As indicated, however, by Mr. Colin F. Stam, counsel for the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, in his statement in the report of Mr. L. H. Parker, previously referred to, the result of this tax presents some doubt and "those persons that would escape would be only those who do not engage in any trade, avocation, or employment, but merely hold securities." Mr. Stam also states that "this scheme would also not extend to State employees engaged in governmental functions of the State, for such occupations being governmental in character could not be reached even through an excise."

If the tax is to be imposed upon securities at all, it would seem that we should certainly reach those persons who "merely hold securities", as referred to by Mr. Stam, since this group actually controls most of the securities.

A third way, of course, is that of amending the internal revenue act to make incomes from United States securities subject to the income-tax laws of the United States, as provided by my bill, S. 1892. As previously pointed out, however, such a measure would not be complete and would only reach Federal securities. If it is deemed advisable at this time not to provide for taxing the income from State and local securities, such a measure would appear to be entirely satisfactory if care is used in making provision to tax Federal securities which are "renewed" or "exchanged."

THE FOREIGN TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

I have assembled some data showing the total estimated Federal and local securities outstanding in leading foreign countries which are exempt from taxation, so that there will be a basis of comparison with our own tax-exempt status. Because of rapidly changing financial situations in each country during the past year or so it is naturally impossible to obtain accurate data. The following summary and information is based largely on data contained in Moody's Manual of American and Foreign Securities for 1933. In some cases the information in the manual has been supplemented by material furnished by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce and by information supplied by banking contacts.

Table I shows the proportion of income tax-exempt securities to the total bonded debt of each country. The total bonded debt as given includes both external and internal obligations, but excludes short-term Treasury notes and war debts. Conversion into dollars has been made at the Federal Reserve buying for October 11, 1933.

Great Britain: Exemption from the payment of the income tax on some types of British Government securities is given only to holders resident outside of Great Britain and on other types is limited to interest not exceeding 5 percent per annum (exhibit B).

France: The tax-exemption status of French Government securities is very complicated, and in Moody's Manual many issues are listed without details on this subject. I have endeavored to supplement the data in Moody's Manual by information secured from private sources. The issues listed are entirely exempt from the French income tax. In addition to those listed there are reported to be other Government issues exempt from the income tax on which detailed information is not available, and which would raise the proportion of income tax-exempt securities to the total outstanding. In addition to the Government securities listed there are 31 provincial and municipal issues exempt from the French income tax (exhibit C).

Germany: In addition to the Government securities listed there are 48 provincial, municipal, and miscellaneous issues exempt from the German income tax (exhibit D).

Italy: In addition to the Government securities listed there are four municipal and miscellaneous issues exempt from the Italian income tax (exhibit E).

Belgium: In addition to the Government securities listed there are nine municipal and miscellaneous issues exempt from the Belgian income tax (exhibit F).

Switzerland: In addition to the Government securities listed there are six municipal and miscellaneous issues exempt from the Swiss income tax (exhibit G).

TABLE I—Proportion of partially or wholly income tax-exempt[1] securities to total bonded debt of country

	Total of income tax-exempt Government securities	Total bonded debt excluding short-term Treasury notes and war debts	Percent tax-exempt securities to total indebtedness
Great Britain[1]	$8,625,913,022	$26,708,865,000	32.30
France	2,673,207,371	14,442,145,800	18.51
Germany	770,936,934	3,708,843,200	20.79
Italy	6,014,016,594	7,079,537,200	84.95
Belgium	597,695,832	1,832,873,916	32.61
Switzerland	324,659,430	1,395,246,870	23.27
	19,006,429,183	55,167,511,986	[2] 35.40

[1] Exemption from the payment of the income tax on some types of British Government securities is given only to holders resident outside of Great Britain and on other types is limited to interest not exceeding £5 per annum. In the case of other countries the securities listed as exempt from the income tax are wholly so.

CONVERSIONS AT FEDERAL RESERVE BUYING RATES FOR OCTOBER 11, 1933

Total bonded debt listed on basis of latest available figures as follows:

Great Britain, March 31, 1933; France, March 31, 1933; Germany, March 31, 1933; Italy, June 30, 1933; Belgium, December 31, 1932; Switzerland, December 31, 1932.

RATIO IN UNITED STATES HIGH

Estimating our outstanding securities in the United States which are totally tax exempt at roughly $7,000,000,000, and adding thereto the issues which are exempt from the normal tax only, approximately $12,000,000,000, we have in round figures around $19,000,000,000 outstanding in some form of Federal tax-exempt securities. The President in his address to Congress on January 3 estimated the present public debt of the Federal Government at $23,000,000,000, which he said would increase to $31,000,000,000 in 1936. Using these figures we see that the ratio of tax-exempt securities to the public debt in the United States is approximately 72 percent as compared with an average of 35.40 percent ratio in foreign countries. Italy alone is higher, with a ratio of 84.95 percent.

Canada has frequently been pointed to as being entirely free from tax-exempt securities. The report regarding Canada, however, must be considered with that of England, as referred to earlier. The general policy of the British Government to limit exemptions only to holders resident outside of Great Britain, on certain types of securities, and to limit the other types of issues, has prevented a much larger ratio, although their figure stands at 32.30 percent, or close to the average for all countries. As pointed out by Representative Charles R. Crisp in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 64: 716, December 19, 1922, when an amendment was pending in the House:

"Canada does not permit any tax-exempt securities to be issued. Canada is having no trouble in selling her bonds, and the Canadian bonds, state and municipal, sell for from one to one and one half percent cheaper than the highest industrial bonds. That will be true here, in my judgment, if this amendment does not interfere with the sovereignty of either the United States or of the several States. It puts them on an exact equality."

Whatever may be said of the circumstances in other countries, the United States is in a position of its own because of its leadership under the new deal. The old arguments for tax exemption have been shattered along with many other theories which have proved false to the American people by actual trial and error. When previous amendments have been proposed and considered by Congress to remove such exemptions the greatest opposition has always centered on the charge that State and local governments would be unable to borrow money to finance public utilities, streets, and other public-works projects which, as a matter of policy, should not be left to private enterprise. They argued that municipal credit would be destroyed, that private control of all financial operations of local governments would result, and that the public would ultimately be charged higher rates for public service under private control than they would pay by borrowing the money through tax-exempt securities.

But what has happened? Did such a policy prevent private enterprise from controlling the situation anyhow? Through all the period of rugged individualism can it be said that the local governments were able to stand on their feet and maintain their credit and keep going along with public projects and public relief, by continuing to issue tax-free obligations at attractive interest rates?

No; what has happened is this: The financial exploitations of our rugged individualists have had such a serious general effect upon our economic life that all manner of credit expansion and taxation has not enabled the States and local governments to withstand the shock. The Federal Government, with its stronger credit, has come in to make loans and grants to municipalities, and to extend aid to States, to feed the hungry, to stimulate business, and to build those streets and bridges and those other public projects which proponents of tax exemption claimed could and would be accomplished by the tax power of the States, or by continued credit of the local governments through issuance of tax-exempt securities.

And there is the answer to the opposition against elimination of State and municipal tax-exempt securities. It appears that the Federal Government will continue to extend aid and credit to them for at least 2 or 3 more years, and it may become necessary, as a part of our new economic situation, to grant them direct credit or aid on some permanent basis.

For the present, at least, it can be said that the Federal Government has largely substituted itself as a creditor of the local governments during the emergency, and for this reason the Federal Government itself will find it necessary to finance its operations both by increasing taxes and by issuing further obligations. Certainly if the Federal Government proposes to make its future issues subject to taxation it should not permit a refuge for great wealth in local tax exemption. While, of course, this is a privilege of the States and local governments, the present period of nationalization, incident to the depression, makes it necessary to look at the interests of the Federal Government and the State and local governments in one perspective. We cannot consistently favor the issuance of tax-exempt securities by the local governments and at the same time propose that the Federal Government should tax its future obligations. By so doing we would still provide an escape mechanism for those of great wealth who seek to avoid the tax and, at the same time, would be limiting the possibilities of the Federal Government in obtaining its necessary credit.

From this Federal standpoint alone, it can be said that recent Treasury offerings have been so largely oversubscribed it is quite evident that with definite fiscal policies and adequate taxation the Federal Government will have no difficulty in issuing securities even if the income from them is subject to taxation.

It has always been my belief that people who invest their money in either Federal or local tax-exempt securities do so for two reasons: (1) Because there is safety, (2) and because of the tax exemptions. By removing the privilege of tax exemption I still feel that the safety factor is sufficient to invite enough capital to maintain Federal and local credit, providing there is an adequate tax program. After such an experience as the American people have had in the stock market and in private investments, I feel reasonably sure that the mere removal of tax exemption from securities issued by the Federal or local governments will not deter them from rushing in, as heretofore, and subscribing to these issues, because of the safety factor alone. They would rather have their principal invested safely at low interest rates, even if they were subject to income tax thereon, than to take a chance on a great many speculative investments in the open market.

WHY A HIGHER INTEREST RATE?

This same reasoning applies also to the arguments of opponents of the amendment that if we tax our securities we must offer an increased interest rate which will more than offset it. This contention was one of the strongest points of the opposition when the constitutional amendment was up before the House in 1922, and at that time many legislators expressed the fear that the increase in interest rates would more than offset the tax derived.

This view is still shared by many, and Mr. Parker, in the report previously discussed before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, states that "an increase in interest rate of one fourth of 1 percent on $40,000,000,000 would cost our Government $100,000,000 annually; an increase of one half of 1 percent would increase the cost $200,000,000 annually."

If it were necessary to pay such increases, it would naturally follow that the outgoing interest rates would be more than the estimated $150,000,000 or $160,000,000 which would be derived from taxes from income, even if all the outstanding issues were taxed.

But doesn't this argument rest upon a false premise? The Treasury Department has recently found it possible to issue short-term obligations at lower interest rates than ever before because of the safety factor. No doubt they could obtain short-term financing at a much lower interest rate, if desired, and each issue would be oversubscribed. And I believe that long-term bonds could be sold and placed with interest rates as low or even lower than those on present obligations. If given a trial, the contention that interest rates will be increased will not prove itself. Moreover, it should be remembered that the tax on incomes from securities would not be the only gains to compare with estimates of increased interest rates which would offset them. There are the gains which would accrue from other sources where tax avoidance is made possible by the very existence of the tax-exempt bonds. Such an instance was referred to by former President Hoover in his report of November 2, 1923, to Senator Smoot, previously inserted in this statement, where "a man may borrow 70 percent on his house, * * * may invest this borrowed sum in tax-exempt securities, and under the present income-tax laws (1922) he may deduct the interest which he pays on his mortgage from his income and does not have to account for the sum he receives on tax-exempt securities."

If all the collatteral gains could be estimated, I am confident that the margin of income to the Federal Government would far exceed the outgoing increase in interest rates, even if we admit that such increases in interest would be necessary, and I am unwilling to concede that it would.

Incident to this argument against eliminating tax exemption is the contention that issues outstanding would immediately become more valuable if a tax is applied only to future issues and not to past issues. But what of it? Are we to feel disappointed because our outstanding Government bonds are more valuable than before? They would act as an advertisement to the public and would have a desirable effect on all Government securities issued in the future.

IS THE AMENDMENT NECESSARY?

Opponents of the amendment to eliminate tax-exempt securities also argue that complete exemption by such an amendment is entirely unnecessary. They contend that complete exemption of all bonds of the National Government from taxation by the State and the local governments and all bonds of the State and local governments from taxation by the National Government, both as to the principal invested and the income derived, has always been the rule in this country. They say that long-established rules in government or taxation should not be reversed except for very good reasons and after full and mature consideration. This is true, but the answer to this argument is that we now live in a different economic age, when reforms of all kinds are prevalent to shock those who have stood by old theories, unaware of the rising tide and public insistence for a change.

It is also contended that the proposed amendment would be unwise and undesirable because it is an interference with State rights. But we have realized in recent years the growing tendency and necessity for Federal intervention and protection and assistance to the States, particularly in great emergencies such as that at present, and also the willingness and insistence of the States to come to the Federal Government for aid. They say that the proposed amendment is a serious encroachment because it involves the power to tax, which is the power to destroy. They say that it would tend to destroy and certainly would impair the credit of the State and local governments, and that it would make it more expensive for the States and local governments to build schools, roads, sewers, etc. But I have already answered this contention. The States are already knocking at the door of the Federal Government for such aid anyhow.

The many other objections which have been presented against such reform have also subsided and have been covered by the rising tide for reform. Most of them were technical in nature, but will reappear again to cloud the issue and to prevent, if possible, the submission of such an amendment to the States for a vote. In this respect I regard the attitude of the opponents somewhat the same as that of those who opposed the submission of the repeal amendment. I also feel that an amendment eliminating tax-exempt securities would be approved by the States with the same confidence and with the same desire for reform as characterized their action on repeal.

No one can doubt that the existing conditions demand a remedy. The presence of a vast and rapidly increasing amount of tax-free bonds has disrupted the national tax system and presents to Congress at this time a problem of national importance. These evils have developed with the adoption by the Federal Government of the high surtaxes, by which it is sought to apportion the taxes among the people in accordance to their ability to pay. A great loss to the Federal Government has resulted, and it is estimated that at least $160,000,000 per year would be available to the Federal Government under the present tax rate if its outstanding exempt issues were taxed.

The complete prohibition of further issues of tax-exempt securities is fair to State and local governments. It would permit taxation without discrimination of State and local securities by the National Government and of national securities by the States. It will restore to the national tax system the principle of paying taxes in proportion to ability to pay.

It is a practicable remedy. It will go into effect gradually as the old issues are retired and new bonds subject to taxation are issued. It will not break faith with the holders of the present tax-free bonds. It has been approved and endorsed by most of the leading scholars, statesmen, and civic organizations, including the late President Harding, the late President Coolidge, former President Hoover, former Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon, Prof. Edmund R. Seligman, the National Tax Association, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and by thousands of other individuals and organizations. The American people now demand some action.

THE LEGAL VIEWPOINTS OF THOSE OPPOSED TO ELIMINATING TAX-EXEMPT SECURITIES

Inasmuch as I have attempted to make this report a comprehensive survey of the tax-exempt-securities problem as it exists, I desire, in fairness to those who oppose the taxation of Government bonds, to present the following summary prepared by Dr. Rite Dielman, a member of the legislative reference staff of the Library of Congress:

ARGUMENTS OPPOSED TO THE TAXATION OF GOVERNMENT BONDS

"The sovereign powers of the Federal Government and of the States over taxation, each in its separate sphere, are clearly set forth by Judge Cooley in his Treatise on the Law of Taxation. The State and the Nation, having each their separate and distinct sphere, within which they are permitted by fundamental law to exercise independent authority, the principle which excludes from one sovereignty the taxing power of another is as much applicable within the American Union to the taxation of State and Nation, respectively, as it is elsewhere. But one sovereignty may permit its own agencies to be taxed by the other, under limitations prescribed by itself. On the general principle above stated, the States are precluded from taxing without Federal permission the bonds of the United States issued under their constitutional power to borrow money. The Federal Government is also without power to tax the corresponding means or agencies of the States; and the municipal corporations, being only a portion of its sovereign power, created as a convenient if not necessary part of the machinery of State government, are as much exempt from the taxation of the Federal Government, in all their revenues, as the State itself.[1]

"The courts have consistently maintained that the power of Congress to levy and collect taxes does not extend to the taxation of State and municipal bonds.[2] All agents and instruments of the State are exempt from the taxing power of the Federal Government. If they may be taxed lightly, they may be taxed heavily; if justly, oppressively. A municipal corporation is a representative of the State and a portion of its governmental power. As a portion of the State its revenues like those o fthe State, are not subject to taxation.[3] A tax upon income derived by a municipal corporation is a tax upon the power of the State and its instrumentalities to borrow money and in consequence repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.[4] Bonds issued by the State or under its authority by its public municipal bodies are means for carrying on the work of the Government and are not taxable even by the United States.[5]

"The States have no power to tax the instrumentalities of the United States Government. To do so would in effect be to give the States a revenue out of the revenue of the United States.[6] A State tax upon the securities of the United States, however small, tends to interfere with the constitutional power of the Government to borrow money on the credit of the United States and constitutes a burden upon the operations of government.[7] All subjects over which the sovereign power of a State extends are objects of taxation. The sovereignty of a State does not extend to means employed by Congress to carry into execution powers conferred by the people of the United States. The people have conferred the power of borrowing money on their Government. The grant of the power is incompatible with a restraining power. The right to tax the contract to any extent when made must operate upon the power to borrow before it is exercised and is a burden on the operations of government. It may be carried to an extent which shall arrest them entirely.[8]

"The power to tax is the power to destroy. If the right to impose a tax exists, it is a right which in its nature acknowledges no limits.[9]
